French President Jacques Chirac called for legal measures to protect judges attacked on the basis of their ethnic or religious origins. In a letter to the country's highest judicial body, Chirac said a recent case in which a Tunisian man demanded an appeal against his sentence because the judge was Jewish "had created undeniable and legitimate anger." The president added, "Anti-Semitism runs contrary to all of France's values."

Also on the same day, swastikas were painted on a mosque in northern France, and an attempt was made to set the building alight.

- Marseille (Monday, Nov. 24)

Swastikas and anti-Semitic slogans and insignia were painted on tombstones in a Jewish cemetery. Some 10 tombstones were desecrated in a nighttime incident at the Trois Luc Cemetery in Marseille, Jewish leaders there said. In addition to the swastikas, White Power and SS slogans were found on the tombs, as were insignias representing the far-right New Order movement. The Marseille regional branch of the CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jews said in a statement that it hoped "everything would be done to place this racist minority, whose acts bring to mind the darkest hours of French history, beyond the pale."

- Istanbul (Monday, Nov. 24)

The Jerusalem Post reported that a Turkish terrorist group claiming responsibility for synagogue bombings in Istanbul had publicly threatened Jews. In a letter publicized on Turkish television Nov. 20, the group blamed Jews for poisoning Muslim society and threatened Turkey's chief rabbi, Isak Haleva. They also wished "Dirty Jews a peaceful Shabbat."

Bargaining with God

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Most of us think we are not supposed to bargain with God when we pray. We think it is unseemly. Yet, that is precisely what most of us do. "Please God, let my father live and I will…" There are many versions. We promise to give charity, pray more fervently or regularly, do some act of righteousness. We promise to be good. Just give us what we want. Somehow that stance seems unbecoming to proper prayer.

But is it? Surely we are supposed to be good all the time, not just upon receiving God's favour. Nevertheless, I think that Jewish notions of prayer allow, even encourage, making deals with God. Termed vows, the Bible recognizes the power of a promise in beseeching God.

Perhaps the most suggestive biblical vow is that of Hannah, mother of Samuel. She pleads with God to give her a son and pledges that if her request is granted, she will dedicate his life to service of God. There are many elements of this story worthy of elaboration, but the simple fact of her request stands as essential. After an interesting misunderstanding, Eli, the priest, blesses her and God grants her request. So the bargain – or vow – works.

Not only is this narrative interesting as story, it also becomes the archetype for appropriate prayer. The rabbis ascertain correct prayer mores from Hannah's actions. Ironically, a woman sets the standard for prayer.

According to the Talmud, both the proper structure and the content of prayer are established by Hannah. True prayer (Tfillah with a capital T) requires standing silently, lips moving and vocal murmuring. The Amidah, the central text of our liturgical tradition emulates Hannah's engagement with God. Most importantly, she demonstrates proper prayer content.

According to Maimonides, prayer must contain praise of God, thankfulness, and a request – a bakashah. Hannah asks and God grants. Thus, we are bound by our ancestral tradition to plead with God.

According to the writings of Rabbi J. B. Soloveitchik, it is imperative for human beings to accept and understand their humanity at the moment of prayer. Praying out of need indicates our true frailty. We are not all-powerful, able to stand alone, totally self sufficient. In all humility, we must recognize our finiteness.

Prayer allows us to approach the Omnipotent, not from a standpoint of equality but from one of submission. We acknowledge our mortality, we accept God's creative power and we ask for help. That is prayer. The definition of the word includes the notions of supplication or entreating. We stand before God asking for blessings, an act that translates into embracing our own place in the order of the universe. Able to accomplish much, required to do good, we need assistance. God grant us that which we truly need.

What is to be done?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

This month, I would like to address the position of the Conservative Movement on gay and lesbian Jews.

In 1992, the Law and Standards Committee of the Rabbinical Assembly passed five policies regarding homosexual Jews:

- no commitment ceremonies for gay and lesbian couples;
- no admittance to rabbinical or cantorial schools: those who are already students or members will not be subject to "witch hunts;"
- each congregation and rabbi will decide whether gays or lesbians will function as teachers or youth leaders for that congregation (taking into account the responsa of the Law and Standards Committee);
- each congregation and rabbi will formulate policies for inclusion in honours and lay leadership positions;
- but they "hereby affirm gays and lesbians are welcome in our congregations, youth groups, camps and schools."

These rather contradictory approaches form the basis for each congregation to address the inclusion of gays and lesbians in synagogue life. My attention immediately goes to the second item, a ruling reminding us of the days when Jews were not admitted to medical schools or internships in Canadian hospitals, and when women were not admitted to those same rabbinical or cantorial schools.

I believe the issues are not merely legalistic. We must examine not only the halachic discussion, but also the deep emotional stresses caused by the knowledge that our own Torah called the practice of male homosexuality an abomination. This term wounds more deeply than words can say.

But there are real people behind these words. Consider: a young man cared for his partner through the final weeks of AIDS and then was barred from his funeral so as not to embarrass the family. Or a strong commitment was shown by a Jewish lesbian couple to sending their children to day school, continuing the precious commandment of teaching our children Torah.

Rabbi Reuven Kimelman wrote a detailed and closely argued responsa in support of the above rulings. I deal with only part of his reasoning. He argues that Judaism is based on family, which the Torah defines exclusively as man and wife, and he says that "the birth of a child most fully validates sexual partnership as a means of [Jewish] continuity. It is there that the Divine presence most fully dwells."

He also argues that family " transcends the participants" and contributes to the health of the entire community. Thus it assures the continuance of the Jewish polity. The health of the entire Jewish community will be compromised if such unions are sanctioned – they will become role models for children and undermine the "privileged position of normative marriage" in Judaism.

Further, he says, to condone homosexual unions will " easily slide into the legitimation of 'loving' incestuous, pedophiliac and adulterous relationships."

Others rest their case on the biblical prohibition and the fact that the first commandment in the Torah is "be fruitful and multiply," something that homosexual couples cannot do unaided.

And yet, and yet. I cannot stomach these condescending arguments. As far as we know, sexual orientation is not a chosen, acquired preference, but something hard-wired into human identity. Despite heroic measures to overcome it, it persists, and its suppression leads to tragic lives and sometimes suicides of despair. Can we assume responsibility for those twisted lives and cold deaths?

The equation of acceptance of homosexuality with incest and pedophilia is appalling. We are talking about two adults making loving decisions, not about the deviants who pounce from a position of power on weaker victims.

Full participation of women in worship was regarded with horror, as the slippery slope into a female-dominated service, with men relegated to the sidelines. Yet the feared "feminization" of Judaism has not happened.

We in the Conservative movement manage a pretty good balance today between men and women as prayer leaders and members of the minyan, and congregational rabbis and cantors are still overwhelmingly male!

Sexual orientation is not, nor should it be regarded as a barrier to Torah study or the high calling of rabbi. Homosexuality does not make one less acute in the apprehension of Torah learning, nor make one less empathetic, a quality most needed by congregations.

Finally, there is no evidence that being taught by a gay person will make you gay. It may, as my children tell me, make you more accepting of the diversity of the Jewish people. We need to take another look at this "we-they" mentality. If we believe that "We are one," then we need to act like it.

Remembering the 'other' 11th

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

A powerful memory overwhelmed me shortly after I woke up on Remembrance Day this year.

As a teen, I used to go with my father to tallis 'n' tfillin, the Sunday morning minyan at Beth Israel Synagogue in north Winnipeg. The service was less a spiritual experience, and more a way to pass the time while the breakfast herring and schnapps were allowed to breathe. Actually, for the schnapps we had on Sunday morning, breathing wasn't enough. While 15 men prayed, the schnapps gasped.

It was a weekly ritual that the men loved: a short service, a two-dollar breakfast (everyone chipped in) and the same chat about sports, politics and synagogue business, with the odd awful joke thrown in for good measure between bites.

Services were led by members of the congregation. My father, not overly confident with his Hebrew, never led the services. He sat quietly at the back of the bland chapel. He joined in congregational singing, but rarely davened out loud.

I don't remember the exact year, but it was some time in the early 1980s. It was Nov. 11. The service ended at its usual time and the usual schnapps and shtick were flowing. My father excused himself after breakfast. A few moments later, I got up to retrieve my tallis and tfillin from the chapel. As I entered, I saw my father – the man who shied away from standing at the front of the room – standing at the pulpit, tallis back on his shoulders, reciting the Kaddish and weeping softly. At 11 a.m.

My father was a veteran of World War II – a proud Canadian soldier who lost friends in the war. He was remembering his fallen comrades – mostly not Jewish – the best way he knew how.

My father served in England during the war. He never saw combat. He had few stories. (In fact, the only one I can remember is the one about him and a few friends getting promoted to corporal, celebrating a little bit too much and then getting busted back to private shortly thereafter.)

But the fact is he served. He was proud to do so. He did what he was asked in the name of Canada and in honour of the king, and because it was right. He felt passionately Canadian and passionately Jewish. When I think back to my father crying while saying Kaddish for his gentile friends, I'm overwhelmed by Canadian and Jewish pride. And I know definitively that those two prides can co-exist.

Our aging World War veterans will soon no longer be with us. And while today's Canadian soldiers deserve our ongoing gratitude, we must be absolutely steadfast in remembering the thousands of people who served this country in world wars I and II and in Korea.

Global realities have changed since my father and his peers were in the armed forces. Today's realities are shaped largely by the events of Sept. 11. In the process of learning to live in this new world, perhaps we're beginning to forget the significance of Nov. 11. But as the veterans of the world wars pass on, it is our responsibility as Canadians and as Jews to recall their heroism and commitment.

When my father died in 1986, a local Jewish war veteran attended the funeral in Legion-issued ceremonial garb. He placed a creased Canadian flag on my father's coffin, said a few words and saluted. It was strange at the time. My father wasn't active in the Legion and I had no clue who this guy was. But when I think back, it made sense. He wasn't just saying goodbye to my father, he was saying goodbye to another small piece of a generation that helped to shape Canada.

After I recalled this memory this past Remembrance Day, I made a point of finding a quiet place to say Kaddish at 11 a.m. But I didn't feel a sense of loss the way my father did. I felt a sense of gratitude.

Kaifeng: the remains of China's old Jewish community

"Shalom," said Moshe Zhang Xingwang, a short, squat, goateed man sporting a black embroidered kippah, green corduroy slacks, a blue-and-grey sweat top and black sneakers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Kaifeng

Greeting me in a high-pitched voice that is fairly common among northern Chinese men, Moshe ushered us into the living room of his spare seventh-floor apartment on the outskirts of Kaifeng, 300 kilometres southwest of Beijing. Kaifeng (population 800,000), China's former capital, is a clean, attractive city of reconstructed imperial palaces and administrative buildings, splendid monasteries and temples, the chrysanthemum-bedecked Dragon Pavilion, a riverside theme park portraying old China and the imposing Iron Pagoda.

As I quickly looked around Moshe's modestly furnished flat before sitting down for a chat, I saw two brass menorahs resting on a shelf, a small plastic Israeli flag affixed to a wall and photographs of Moshe posing with Orna Namir (Israel's former ambassador to China) and of the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

Moshe, a cheerful 56-year-old physical education teacher, is clearly not a typical Chinese person. In fact, Moshe is a rarity, a direct descendant, on his father's side, of Jews who settled in Kaifeng about 1,000 years ago.

In all of the vastness of China, with a mind-boggling population of about 1.2 billion, there are only 300 individuals like Moshe – 100 in Kaifeng, where Jewish traders from India, Iran and Afghanistan settled after reaching Cathay via the fabled Silk Road, and 200 in the rest of the country.

Moshe Zhang Xingwang

Whether self-appointed or not, Moshe, a warm, engaging man who makes visitors feel at home, has set himself up as the spokesperson for these people. Foreigners interested in Kaifeng Jewry are always directed to Moshe.

When I asked how he identifies himself, he replied, "Chinese, with Jewish blood." Munching an oversize apple as he spoke, Moshe explained that while he is an atheist, he feels a great kinship with his Jewish ancestors. He observes the sabbath (though not major Jewish holidays), lights candles on Shabbat and refrains from eating pork and blood-soaked meat. And in deference to his forefathers, which he can authoritatively trace back to the early 17th century, he wears a yarmulke.

Moshe began to seriously identify with his Jewish ancestors about a decade ago, when China launched far-reaching economic reforms, opened itself up to the world in a bid to modernize itself, and began tolerating religious freedom. Last year, accompanied by his 20-year-old son, he went to Nanjing University's Judaic Institute to learn more about Jewish traditions and history (his grandfather had taught him a little) and to study Hebrew. He hopes to travel to Israel one day.

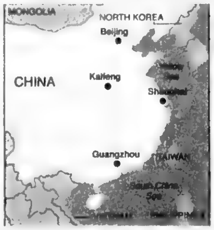
I was not surprised to hear that anti-Semitism has never intruded into Moshe's life. Chinese emperors welcomed Jews (called Youties in Mandarin), and the Jewish community in Kaifeng – the most permanent and long-lasting in China – was gradually so integrated and assimilated into Chinese society that it simply disappeared.

Pan Guang, a Chinese scholar based in Shanghai, claims that the first Jews came to China during the Han dynasty (206 B.C.E. to 220 C.E.) But it was not until the 10th century, under the Northern Song dynasty, that Jews established a community in Kaifeng, known then as Dongjing. Smack dab in the middle of Henan province, and lying along the Yellow River, Kaifeng was a thriving mercantile town of 1.5 million at the dawn of the second millennium.

The emperor, having accepted a tribute of cotton goods they had brought with them, is said to have declared, "You have come to our China. Respect and preserve your customs of your ancestors here in Kaifeng."

Enjoying equal rights and free to pursue their activities as merchants, the Jews of Kaifeng built a synagogue in 1163, renovating it a century later. During the Ming dynasty (1368-1644), the community prospered, reaching a population of approximately 4,000 among 500 families. Jewish communities also emerged in cities such as Guangzhou, Hangzhou and Ningbo, but only the one in Kaifeng endured.

By the 17th century, Kaifeng's Jewish residents had drifted into the civil service, the professions, the skilled crafts and agriculture. Amid a remarkable climate of tolerance and acceptance virtually unique in the annals of Jewish history, they absorbed Chinese habits, dressed like Chinese, took Chinese names such as Zhao, Li, Ai, Gao, Jin and Shi and intermarried. When the Ming emperors closed the Silk Road to commerce, the Jews of Kaifeng were isolated and forgotten.



Their isolation was abruptly broken in 1605 when the Italian Jesuit priest, Matteo Ricci, met Ai Tian, a Chinese Jew from Kaifeng. Less than 40 years later, the synagogue and many of its religious artifacts were swept away by a flood. In 1642, the shul was rebuilt in the shape of a pagoda. But over the next few centuries, the community declined as Jews stopped practising Judaism, the last rabbi died and the synagogue fell into decrepitude and was once again inundated by flood waters.

In the 19th century, their deracinated descendants, some mired in poverty, sold Torah scrolls and Hebrew manuscripts to Christian missionaries. These priceless relics ended up in the British Museum, Oxford University, Cambridge University, Southern Methodist University in Dallas and the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. A small collection of artifacts, ranging from a lacquered wooden Torah case to rubbings from a 15th century stone stele commemorating the rebuilding of Kaifeng's synagogue, found their way into the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

The Canadian connection is intriguing. Bishop William White, a Church of England missionary working in Kaifeng in the early 20th century, made a serious attempt to revitalize the community. In 1942, the University of Toronto Press published his book, Chinese Jews.

By 1907, when The National Geographic magazine published a piece by Oliver Bainbridge titled "The Chinese Jews," the Jews of Kaifeng had been reduced to a pathetic rump. The community, Bainbridge wrote, "has dwindled down to eight families, numbering in all about 50 persons, who have in a great measure forgotten their characteristic observances through frequent vicissitudes and varied conditions of life." Many of the Jews, he added, "had merged into Mohammedanism through persecution and distress."

And all efforts to bring them back to Judaism failed.

Today, in Kaifeng's City Museum, on the banks of Lord Bao Lake, the remnants of a dead community are displayed in "An Exhibition of the History and Culture of Ancient Kaifeng Jews." The exhibit, on the top floor of the museum in two dusty, dimly illuminated rooms with barely legible explanatory signs and a geographically inaccurate map of the Silk Road, is normally closed to the public, said its pleasant curator, Yue Qin.

Special arrangements must be made to view the unimpressive objects, most of which are enclosed in glass cases: a large stone bowl, two stone tablets and three ink rubbings, all taken from the synagogue, and a scroll of the synagogue's interior. There are five empty glass display cases, waiting to be filled should further artifacts ever be found.

The ruins of Kaifeng's synagogue were scattered after the land it was on was sold to Canadian missionaries. The Number 4 Hospital now stands on the site, and the hospital's gloomy power plant sits on what was once the synagogue's courtyard and well.

A block away, on a narrow alley of drab cinderblock homes, is the Teaching Torah Lane, the former residential quarter of Kaifeng Jewry. There I met Cui Shu Ping, whose late husband, Zhao Pingyu, was a descendant of a Kaifeng Jewish family. Her home, consisting of two small rooms, is something of a shrine of Kaifeng's Jewish past.

Teaching Torah Lane [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

On the walls, and arrayed on shelves, are photographs of long-deceased Kaifeng Jews in pigtails; paper cuts fashioned into menorahs and a Star of David; a decorative plate of Jerusalem; and four brass menorahs. The paper cuts were hand-crafted by one of Cui's daughters, and the Jewish souvenirs were left behind by Israeli tourists.

These, then, are the remains of a vanished Jewish community that has morphed into an alluring historical oddity, a community that passed into the vacuum of history through rampant assimilation and near-total isolation.

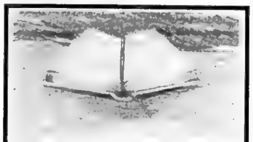
Jacob's ladder brings us to the real world

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Rabbinic Reflections

Is the main story of Judaism the story of anti-Semitism or of man's journey together with God?

How would you interpret the great story in this week's parshah of Jacob and the ladder? Esau wants to kill Jacob for having stolen the birthright. Jacob flees for his life from the land of Israel.

He lies down that night and has a dream. He dreams of a ladder reaching up to the heavens. Angels are going up and down the ladder. HaShem assures him that all will be well and he will return in peace to the land of Israel.

What is the main point of this story? Is it about anti-Semitism? Is God saying, there will always be enemies, dear Jacob. You are running from an enemy, your brother, who wants to kill you. And by the way, it won't be much better in Lavan's house. He will pretend to be your friend but will really want to stab you in the back. So Jacob, let Me assure you that I will protect you and you will survive anti-Semitism and the enemies of the Jews, both those in exile and in the land.

Or is this an entirely different story? Is God saying, Jacob, look at those angels going up and down the ladder. Look at who is at the top of the ladder. Jacob, you and your people have a special relationship with Me that is connected to the land of Israel. All these blips along the way, don't worry about them – the bigger picture is you walking with Me, our special relationship through life.

Now, I may be reading a bit too much into this story from the Torah, but I feel a bit jaded looking at the modern Jewish world. You would think, when reading Jewish newspapers, when seeing the topics of the wonderful speakers and lectures offered in our community, when hearing rabbis' sermons, that the biggest issue in the Jewish world today is anti-Semitism, both in the land of Israel and in the Diaspora.

I flinch at this. I think our world today is Jacob's world. His brother wants to kill him. He is going to have a host in exile – Lavan – who is duplistic, who loves him and maybe hates him, who accommodates him but is happy to have him leave.

Yet I don't think that is the point of the story of the ladder. The point is we must rise above our momentary challenges and climb up the ladder to the top, where our relationship with HaShem, our special covenant, is apparent. God is saying this relationship is the heart of you, Jacob – Esau's hatred to you does not define you, nor does the ambivalent relationship with Lavan define you – My pact with you, My covenant with you, is your definition.

Today's Jewish world faces many challenges. The persistent anti-Semitism is of great concern, as is the continual, decades-long tensions in the land of Israel. However, in the heart of each Jew is our covenant with God, our loyalty to Him and His loyalty to us. The heart of each Jew lies in our Jewish living, our learning the Torah, our aspirations to do mitzvot with a full heart, with a heart of passion.

I think the ladder transports us above this world to the real world of Jewish living.

Psychological probing of midrash

Wise Men and Their Tales: Portraits of Biblical, Talmudic and Hasidic Masters,* by Elie Wiesel, Random House, $40.00.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Wise Men and Their Tales, like Wiesel's previous books, Souls on Fire and Sages and Dreamers is a compendium of lectures given at the famous 92nd Street Y in New York and at Boston University.

Much of the material here may be familiar. But Wiesel brings to it psychological probing midrashic commentary and the wisdom that flows from his own singular experience – as well as an unexpected vein of humour.

Freshly presented by a master storyteller is: the matriarch Sarah, fiercely guarding her son, Isaac, against the negative influence of his half-brother Ishmael; Samson, the solitary hero and protector of his people, whose singular weakness brought about his tragic end; Isaiah, caught in the middle of the struggle between God and man, his messages of anger and sorrow counterbalanced by his timeless, eloquent vision of a world at peace; the saintly Rabbi Yahoshua ben Levi, who by virtue of a lifetime of good deeds was permitted to enter heaven while still alive and who tried to ensure a similar fate for all humanity by stealing the sword of the Angel of Death.

Wise women are not overlooked. In addition to considering the life of Sarah, Wiesel also looks at the lives of Hagar and Miriam. About Miriam, he writes that her whole life was lived under the sign of water. Remove the Hebrew letter resh from her name and you have mayim – water.

"We meet her on the banks of the Nile, we find her on the far shore of the Red Sea. We leave her, or she leaves us, as her people are clamouring for water. Water is like love: we only appreciate it in its absence. To the thirsty, it stands for happiness; to the slaked, the satisfied, it represents the banality of everyday life. Water is the liquid of life, but also a call by death and to death."

The chapter "Converts in the Talmud" leads to a general discussion of the conversion process. Wiesel points out that Judaism does not recognize conversion to another religion. A Jew who is born Jewish, according to tradition, remains a Jew. In the Middle Ages, the Church punished conversion to Judaism with death.

When Jews were accused of seducing Christians into conversion, harsh collective punishments followed. To protect their communities, great rabbinic authorities, such as Rabbi Gershon ben Yaakov of the 13th century, implored their congregants not to discuss theology with Christians, so as to avoid the appearance of trying to influence them.

Wiesel insists that Christians need not become Jewish to be respected by Jews. The same applies to Muslims.

"I insist on this because a regrettable speech was recently heard in the United States. Some Southern Baptists announced their intention to convert all Jews in America. Well – that is some ambitious project… if they persist in trying to convert all American Jews, well – let them start with me."

Often Wiesel poses questions. But he provides few answers. The question mark is as prominent as the period. Yet always his explorations, which draw on a vast tradition of wisdom and insight, are illuminating and rewarding.

Loses 105 pounds & keeps it off ... five years & counting!

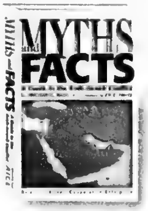
The differences between Berlin Wall, security fence

MYTH:

Israel's so-called security fence is just like the Berlin Wall.

FACT:



Although critics have sought to portray the security fence as a kind of Berlin Wall, it is nothing of the sort. First, unlike the Berlin Wall, the fence does not separate one people, Germans from Germans, and deny freedom to those on one side. Israel's security fence separates two peoples, Israelis and Palestinians, and offers freedom and security for both.

Second, while Israelis are fully prepared to live with Palestinians, and 20 per cent of the Israeli population is already Arab, the Palestinians are the ones saying they do not want to live with any Jews and call for the West Bank to be judenrein.

Third, the fence is not being constructed to prevent the citizens of one state from escaping. It is designed solely to keep terrorists out of Israel.

Finally, of the 150 miles scheduled to be constructed, only a tiny fraction of that (about five miles) is actually a 30-foot-high wall, and that is being built in three areas where it will prevent Palestinian snipers from around the terrorist hotbeds of Kalkilya and Tulkarm from shooting at cars as they have done for the last three years along the Trans-Israel Highway, one of the country's main roads. The wall also takes up less space than the other barriers, only about seven feet, so it did not have a great impact on the area where it was built.

Most of the barrier will be a chain-link type fence similar to those used across the United States that are combined with underground and long-range sensors, unmanned aerial vehicles, trenches, landmines and guard paths. Manned checkpoints will constitute the only way to travel back and forth through the fence. The barrier is altogether about 160 feet wide in most places.

Israel did not want to build a fence, and resisted doing so for more than 35 years. If anyone is to blame for the construction, it is Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other Palestinian terrorists. Perhaps its construction may help stimulate the Palestinians to take action against the terrorists because the barrier has shown them there is a price to pay for sponsoring terrorism.

Holocaust restitution deadlines

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

In recent years, Holocaust survivors have had the opportunity to apply for restitution from governments, banks and other institutions that had stolen their property. Some deadlines have passed, but others are approaching. Today, an overview of compensation funds with impending deadlines, along with Web sites with excellent resources for people considering applying for restitution. The information below is a summary of the conditions of these funds. Please read the Web sites carefully before you apply. Most apply to very specific types of claims.

The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims – Deadline: Dec. 31

The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims was established by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, the World Jewish Congress, the State of Israel, the Claims Conference and five major European insurance companies. It has published the names of insurance policyholders from the Holocaust era, with the goal of enabling heirs of victims to search the list for policies held by their families. Claim forms can be downloaded from http://www.icheic.org/submit/english.html.

Holocaust Fund for Property (Slovakia Republic) – Deadline: Dec. 31

This fund was created "to mitigate some material damages caused by the Holocaust, to persons to whom their [real estate] property has not been returned or in any other way compensated." Survivors who emigrated after the war can apply, as can eligible successors [http://www.holocaustslovakia.sk/english.php].

Austrian Slave and Forced Labor Fund – Deadline: Dec. 31

The Austrian parliament has approved a fund called "Austrian Fund for Reconciliation, Peace and Co-operation" to compensate former slave and forced labourers. The estimated number of survivors eligible for compensation under this law is 150,000, of whom roughly 10,000 are Jewish and could include Hungarian Jews who were deported to Austria in 1944 and 1945. NCSY opens drop in centre for teenagers

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) has opened a new drop-in centre for teens on Eglinton Avenue just west of Bathurst Street.

The centre is run by newlyweds Shmuel and Elana Soroka, who are alumni of NCSY, the youth outreach arm of the Union of Orthodox Hebrew congregations (O-U).

When the two got engaged, they asked Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY, for an assignment. He suggested they establish a presence in the Bathurst-Eglinton area. In September, they opened a renovated 1,000-square-foot space in a building donated by the owners.

The centre has a small office area, ping- pong and pool tables, sofas and a supersize television. Large tables are used for study, discussion, meals or whatever else is needed.

"It's a safe place for kids to hang out and just chill," said Elana.

The centre has no particular schedule, Elana said.

NCSYers relax and enjoy a game of pool at the drop-in centre on Eglinton Avenue. At right: Dedication of the new office with Sid Jelinek (left), the property manager of the building putting up the mezuzah with Shmuel and Elana Soroka.

"It's crucial to have a spot where kids can just hang out and socialize, with no pressure."

The centre currently offers junior and senior NCSY programs, free pizza lunches and a drop-in on Tuesday nights, where kids can come to relax, play games, have a snack, see a movie or participate in discussions. Plans are to expand these programs in the near future.

These activities are supplemented by the many educational programs NCSY holds at local schools, Shmuel said. For instance, the organization runs the Culture Club, an outreach program for public high school students, at Forest Hill Collegiate Institute.

The couple said they plan to work with the whole community. In addition to their work at the new centre, they said also teach NCSY Torah High classes at Shaarei Shomayim and Chabad of Midtown and have organized other events in the area, such as a sukkah party, a weekly Carlebach minyan and a monthly Friday night dinner at the nearby Village Shul, as well as several Shabbatons.

They say being a husband and wife team benefits their work.

"We are an educational and a social team," Elana said. "We can have kids over for Shabbat, and they get to know both of us."

Rabbi Black told The CJN that opening the centre at Eglinton is part of NCSY's mandate to serve the estimated 18,000 affiliated and non-affiliated Jewish teenagers in the GTA.

"We started with a storefront at Baycrest and Bathurst, then eight years ago we moved north to Steeles. When the new federation campus opens at Bathurst and Weldrick, we plan to open a centre there too."

The first drop-in centre was at the Bathurst and Steeles location. "Now, there are 12 or 15, including Los Angeles, Vancouver and

Senator Grafstein to monitor Georgian elections

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Sen. Jerry Grafstein, who heads the liberal, democratic and reform caucus in the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), has been appointed to an OSCE election-observation mission and will travel to the Republic of Georgia to monitor that country's election next month.

Grafstein, who will be making his third trip to the Caucasus Mountain state, will also serve as part of a Canadian all-party delegation that will observe Georgia's presidential election on Jan. 4.

The election was called after President Eduard Shevardnadze stepped down in the wake of massive demonstrations in the capital, Tbilisi, to protest a rigged parliamentary election on Nov. 2. Shevardnadze was forced to resign when the parliamentary building was stormed by angry legislators and the army sided with protesters.

Grafstein said the OSCE presence as well as that of monitors from other international organizations will play a key role in assuring Georgia remains on the road to democracy.

The OSCE "is more effective than the United Nations in building democracy and freedom. We're the carpenters and electricians of building democratic organizations," he said, adding the OSCE has assisted countries in central and eastern Europe organize political parties, a public service, and free labour and capital markets.

The OSCE, which evolved from the Helsinki Accord of the mid-1970s, urges states to respect human rights and it played an important role in the collapse of the Soviet Union. Last summer it called on its 55 members to take steps to address a rising wave of anti-Semitism.

The OSCE, Grafstein said, has been trying to shepherd Georgia towards democratic reform for several years. It has invested its prestige in attempting to work against separatist influences in a number of Georgian regions while promoting parliamentary reform and an open society.

At the same time, international financier George Soros has been working on a parallel track – unco-ordinated with the OSCE – to promote creation of grass roots and democratic initiatives, Grafstein said.

He suggested Georgia's location north of Turkey and south of Russia make it of strategic interest to the West. A proposed oil pipeline that will bring millions of barrels of Caspian oil to the West via Turkey will traverse Georgia. As well, Georgia sits just south of Chechnya, where Islamic rebels have been fighting Russian forces for years. The United States has sent military personnel to train Georgian forces in counter-insurgency techniques.

Grafstein was critical of the Canadian government for ignoring the region too long. Canada has no diplomatic representation in the Caucasus and it, along with other the Western nations, particularly the EU, neglected Georgia in the 1990s as its economy withered. Georgians desperately want to "face west" and Canada could trade on its strong reputation as an independent, middle-sized democracy to steer Georgia on a course to an open society, he said.

What's more, Canadian "benign neglect" has frozen it out of all work on the proposed oil pipeline even though "we are the leading technologists and engineers in long distance pipelines."

In 1998, Grafstein addressed the Georgian parliament, discussing Canada's open society and urging Georgia to adopt Canada's pluralist approach to politics. At the time, he was the first Canadian legislator to address the Georgian parliament.

Instead of investing in diplomatic representation in the Caucasus, Grafstein said Canada has erected "monumental embassies" in London and Paris. More should be done in helping emerging democracies in eastern Europe and the countries in central Asia which end in "stan." Doing so now could get Canada in on the ground floor when these countries expand their trade, Grafstein suggested.

"I have high expectation we will have a much more realistic and cost effective foreign policy under the new government [of Paul Martin] than under the previous Liberal government," he added.

DEDICATION: A piper and colour guard from the General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion marked the recent re-dedication ceremony for the newly renovated Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, in remembrance of the Canadian Jewish soldiers killed in action. Fifty years earlier, the Wingate branch was active in raising funds to build the downtown JCC, which was dedicated to "Canadians of the Jewish faith who gave their lives in service to their country." Former minister of national defence Barney Danson, who was also an active fundraiser for the original JCC, delivered the keynote address at the re-dedication, and a remembrance song was performed by Grade 2 students from the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, which is housed at the JCC. The building's 1953 cornerstone now sits in front of the refurbished Nadal JCC at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue.

Linitzer society marks 90 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 90 years, the Linitzer Benefit Society is still going strong.

The organization, which began with about 25 immigrants from the Ukrainian town of Linitz (today called Ilintsy), has a membership today of more than 200 families. At its largest, the society had about 500 member families.

Carl Kellen, 79, who has been a member for 55 years, says about 70 or 80 people still turn out to meetings, which are held six times a year. One member, Joe Mazin, has belonged for 65 years.

The secret to its success, Kellen says, "is that we keep our children involved. We understand that if we don't bring in young people, the society will disappear.

"My own father Louis, joined in 1918, and now my son David, is active. The children are the ones who are running the society," says Kellen, who is honorary president.

Linitzer Benefit Society president David Kellen honours Joe Mazin, a 65-year-member, at the society's 90th anniversary celebration.

Since 1916, when the society was chartered as the Linitzer Sick Benefit Society, its mandate has been to help members in need, says Kellen.

"Our founders fled from oppression in Europe and sought the right to raise their families in freedom, earn an honest living and have their children gain entrance to any university. They helped create the city's garment industry, and they were [in the forefront] of the establishment of Baycrest Centre and Mount Sinai Hospital.

"During the '20s and '30s, the society paid for members' doctors' visits, and also paid for funerals and put up monuments at the Linitzer sections in Dawes Road or Bathurst Lawn cemeteries."

Kellen's father died in 1935, he says, and the family was in desperate financial need.

"When things were tough, I knew there was a society."

In 1970, Kellen had heart surgery in Cleveland, Ohio, and was allowed no visitors, but then-president Morris Resnick snuck into the hospital and walked up nine floors to see him.

"He just had to see for himself how I was doing," he says.

"The bottom line is that we do not abandon people when they have problems. That is what we try to teach our children."

The organization has always supported various charities, Kellen says.

"In 1943, we donated an ambulance to the Canadian army, and this year we equipped a Magen David Adom ambulance. We also maintain an endowment fund at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem."

Today, the society supports the Heart and Stroke Foundation, UJA Federation and a number of institutions in Israel.

Kellen says Linitzer members are proud of their history.

"As Jews, and as children of the Holocaust, we know what survival means. We are behind all political parties that support peace and security…

"We are survivors – Jewish survivors. Our history is written in the history of this city, this province, this country."

Chasm between secular, haredi Jews said problem

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is usually seen as the biggest war being waged in Israel, but the deep chasm between secular and haredi Jews is equally if not more worrisome, says an Israeli scholar.

"In Israel now, there is a war over what it means to be a Jew," said Bar-Ilan University professor Noah Efron, who spoke recently on "Israel's Other War: The Struggle Over Jewish Identity in Israel" at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

"There is a sense in Israel… that we need to hate" the haredi community, said the author of Real Jews: Secular, Ultra Orthodox and the Struggle for Jewish Identity, published last May by Basic Books.

Efron, who spent 10 years researching for his book, said secular Zionists, by and large, harbour feelings of hatred and anger toward haredim, and vice versa.

> Author says secular Zionists, by and large, harbour feelings of hatred and anger toward haredim, and vice versa

For instance, he spoke of the recent rash of infant deaths in Israel caused by a vitamin deficiency in the kosher Remedia Super Soya 1 baby formula made by the German company Humana.

Israel's mainstream press reported that haredi rabbis "prevented the [formula] company from including the vitamin because it was not kosher," Efron said, adding that the main slant was that the rabbis valued kashrut over human life.

Efron said the vast majority of the Israeli public bought into this notion, yet it turned out that the real cause of the deficiency was an error made by the company's factory workers.

He also cited a recent play he attended in Israel, in which haredim were depicted as massing nuclear attacks on Europe in order to spur the coming of the messiah.

"People applauded," he said. "No one seemed to really question that notion of ultra-Orthodox Jews wresting control [of the world]."

Efron identified the following five reasons for the anger: haredim do not typically serve in the Israeli army; the perception that an unfair amount of tax money goes toward supporting yeshivas; the belief that the haredi value system is being imposed on the larger society; and a fear that neighbourhoods are being "lost" to the haredi community.

Efron outlined shortcomings for each point.

He noted that in one secular, wealthy Tel Aviv suburb, only one-sixth of the residents eligible to serve in the army do so.

With respect to haredim studying Torah instead of working, Efron said, there is "something lovely about sacrificing material things… to study Torah."

He said there is a historic dimension to the divide: early Zionist ideology portrayed haredi Jews as the "old Jew" and the secular Israeli as the "modern, new Jew."

The main tenet of Israeli MK Tommy Lapid's platform in Israel's last election was to lead secular Israelis to freedom from haredi "oppressors," said Efron, who referred to himself as "modern Orthodox, although I view myself as a culturally secular Jew."

"This is a tragedy. It is a tremendous injustice."

Efron's solution is dialogue.

"I have great faith in discussion," he said, adding that another part of the solution is for Israelis to celebrate Zionism's successes instead of harping on the negative.

"People have to stop being so violently self- critical and start talking about the positive things," he said.

Efron, who is chair of Bar-Ilan's graduate program for history and philosophy of science, is currently working on a new book called Golem, God and Man: Human and Divine in the Age of Biotechnology.

A sobering experience for high school students

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

More than 25,000 Ontario students visit the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto each year, and according to Dana Wallace, a teacher at Pierre Elliott Trudeau High School in Markham, just two hours at the centre can make a profound difference in young lives.

"As a leader, you hope to not only teach students, but you hope to be an instrument of change," says Wallace, who recently brought 45 students to the centre. "To experience the Holocaust through an actual survivor is incredible for these kids. You can watch all the documentaries and read all the books about the Holocaust, but once the students come here, they go into total shock. It just doesn't become real until they come here."

Leonard Vis, a 73-year-old Holocaust survivor from Holland, and the speaker for Wallace's group, has been teaching students about the horrors of the Holocaust since 1989.

"Combating racism begins with education," Vis told his audience. "Like many of the Holocaust survivors, I'm not going to be around that much longer and it is vital that I teach all of you about what discrimination and hatred can lead to. How it felt to be a little Jewish boy in Holland who was hated for no reason. I still have many of those terrible feelings today, at the age of 73."

And his emotional candor was not lost on his young listeners.

"It's so important because we simply can't let something like the Holocaust ever happen again," said 15-year-old Patrick Knight. "To prepare for this day we watched movies, did assignments, and learned a lot about World War II in general. I'm hoping to learn much more about the Holocaust, and I'm hoping that many more people come and learn what the history books just can't teach."

"We absolutely have to know, first-hand, what happened during the Holocaust," observed 16-year-old Daniel Nguyen. "Everybody should know about the past and what it must have been like for the Jews to face such terrible discrimination and hatred."

"Humanity has always had three basic needs," said Vis. "Food, shelter, and somebody to blame. It's always been the Jews who have filled that need."

According to Wallace, the lessons learned at the Holocaust Centre are lessons in life.

"My students have learned that while there were many people who did what they could to help Jews during the Holocaust, there were many who simply did nothing. Now they know that they have a responsibility for others and they shouldn't be like those who did nothing."

The Chapel Club: together for 30 years

Not many groups can claim to be successfully functioning after three decades, but the Chapel Club, a group of men and women – many of them former Second World War soldiers - has been meeting regularly for the past 30 years in the chapel at Toronto's Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, which officially opened on Sunday.

Chaired by Coleman Bernstein, club members come together every Thursday and Sunday to remember the past, and support one another.

The chapel is named after Bernstein's brother, Michael, who was just 17 when he enlisted, and died three years later while stationed in Italy.

"If my brother Michael was alive today, he would be absolutely overjoyed to see this wonderful chapel named in his honour," says Bernstein, who became Chair of the club following the death of his other brother, Leonard, seven years ago. "Michael was such a great guy, a fantastic brother, a true patriot and one heck of a son. He used to send his paycheques home to my mother, telling her to buy a new dress or something else he knew would make her happy."

The Chapel Club began at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre – now the Nadal Centre - in 1974 with little more than a closet and a whole lot of determination and commitment.

"At first, they could only give us space in a closet at the old 'Y'," says Bernstein. "But, eventually, when they knew we were here for the long haul, they gave us more and more space. About seven or eight years ago, we renamed the chapel after my brother Michael. We had a parade, the whole works."

According to Naomi Rose, Executive Director of the Nadal Centre, the Chapel Club fills an important niche in the lives of Bernstein and the others.

"The Chapel Club provides a wonderful anchor for these men and women," says Rose. "Some of these same men have been davening here for 30 years. It's an incredibly caring, warm atmosphere where they look out for one another. It's a tremendous thing they've accomplished here. "

The new state-of-the-art Nadal Centre was rebuilt on the site of the original Bloor Jewish Community Centre – affectionately known as the south "Y". The original "Y" was built in 1953 with funds raised by returning World War II veterans, and it was dedicated to the memory of Jewish Canadian servicemen who lost their lives.

Coleman, who is also a volunteer with Meals on Wheels, is proud of what he and the others have accomplished.

"This club has become a real staple in the lives of so many people who come from all over Toronto to participate, either by saying kaddish or commemorating a yartzheit," says Bernstein. "For me, the most important thing about our club is the camaraderie it provides. As far as I'm concerned, the Michael Bernstein Chapel is one of the most beautiful small chapels in Toronto, and I think anybody who comes for a visit would feel the same way."

Jewish Toronto solidifies status as largest Canadian community

By WENDY LAMPERT

Toronto has strengthened its position as Canada's premiere Jewish city, with a Jewish population that is growing faster than that of any other major Canadian centre.

That's one of the latest findings based on 2001 census data from Charles Shahar, chief demographic researcher for UIA Federations Canada.

The Greater Toronto Area Jewish population numbers 179,100, making up almost 85% of Ontario's Jewish population and almost half of all Jews in Canada. In the last decade, the number of Jews living in Toronto has grown by 9.8%, far surpassing the 3.5% Jewish population growth in Canada as a whole.

"Toronto is the cultural and economic hub of English Canada. The quality of Jewish life in Toronto is one of the highest in North America. It has a long history of being a close-knit and diversified community," said Shahar.

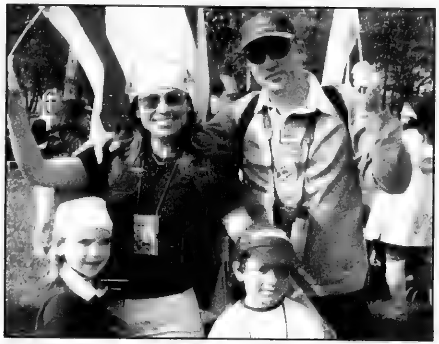
Shahar noted that Toronto also offers a sense of stability and continuity to Jewish immigrants. "The Jewish infrastructure in Toronto is particularly strong, and it accommodates a very diversified range of Jewish identity," he said. "It absorbs a multitude of different segments. Members of the immigrant Jewish population, when they come to Toronto, feel like they've come to the right place because of the strength of the community and its organization."

With a median age of 39.4 years, Toronto's Jewish population is slightly younger than that of Vancouver, a surprising finding according to Shahar. "That fact bodes well for the future of the Toronto community, which includes a significant population of young adults and young families," he said. "On average, Toronto has a younger community than most other major Jewish centres in Canada."

However, Toronto's Jewish baby boomer population is aging. "The baby boomer has hit middle age, so to speak," said Shahar, who noted that by the time the next census is completed, these same boomers will begin to swell the ranks of seniors, those 65 and older, who make up 15.4% of Toronto's Jewish community. Currently, almost 45% of all Jewish seniors in Canada live in Toronto.

"The analysis of this census data provides a revealing portrait of our community," said Warren Kimel, Chair of Community Planning & Allocations for UJA Federation. "For example, these statistics make it clear that appropriate services for seniors should be available as they progress through the aging process," he added.

Kimel said the community wants to work with the government to ensure that there are programs to support both healthy seniors and those who are becoming increasingly frail. "Through home support services and community programming, we want to help people remain independent for as long as possible, and continue to engage them as important members of Jewish Toronto. Holocaust survivors also have unique needs that should be addressed."



With a median age of only 39, the future looks bright for Toronto's young and vibrant Jewish community.

Report from the Chair

Inspiring stories from a remarkable mission

By LESLIE GALES
Chair, UJA Federation

In English it means "together" and UJA Federation's recent B'yachad mission truly typified its name. Three hundred of us - one of the largest UJA Federation mission contingents to ever visit Israel - travelled together, learned about Israel's current realities together and absorbed the remarkable spirit of our extraordinary Jewish homeland.

None of us came back the same.

There are so many stories to tell, but the following experiences illustrate how the people of Israel maintain their passion for life and the Jewish values that make life worth living despite the difficulties they face.

A deeper meaning

The members of Israel's Fire Brigade are routinely confronted by terrorism-related dangers. With every fire, there's always the risk of deadly chemical or biological weapons or becoming the target of a secondary round of bullets and grenades. That's why, on this mission, Toronto's Jewish community dedicated to the brigade, a uniquely equipped fire truck. On our visit, the brigade commander explained the difference between Israeli and California fire fighting techniques. California crews, he said, often wait until a fire is under control before removing individuals who are trapped inside (after monitoring their safety). Israelis, he continued, puncture a hole in the building, in order to immediately remove men, women and children. Just a technical difference in approach? I don't think so. Israeli firefighters understand the devastating impact of one lost life on the future of the country - on the future of the Jewish world. Everything in Israel houses deeper meaning.

One people

We were privileged on this mission to meet both an Israeli soldier and a Toronto birthright israel trip participant with whom he had been matched, as part of the Mifgashim program. Through a special grant provided by UJA Federation's Venture Philanthropy Fund, Mifgashim brings Israeli soldiers together with birthright israel's young people. The birthright israel member told us how much his newfound friendship with the soldier had affected him emotionally and ignited his spirituality. The soldier explained the way in which his encounter had altered his Jewish worldview. He used to think that he was fighting to protect his family, his ancestors and his country. Now he understands that he is fighting for Jews everywhere. We are truly one people.

A tough decision

Finally, my teenage daughter, Stephanie, who accompanied me on B'yachad, was torn between donating her bat mitzvah money to the Ethiopian children of Kiryat Moshe, who touched her heart because they need so much (UJA Federation strongly supports the community) or helping to purchase urgently required protective uniforms for the Fire Brigade. It was a classic struggle between an emotional decision (Kiryat Moshe) and a practical one (the Fire Brigade). Her heart eventually won over her mind, but there are so many needs and, fortunately, so many generous, caring community members in Toronto to meet them.

Our UJA Federation annual campaign is closing in on $50 million. With your help we will, once again, exceed $60 million to assist victims of terror, preserve Israeli social services, fight anti-Semitism and educate a new generation to deal with anti-Jewish intimidation.

Before I left for Israel I knew in my mind that Jewish unity is our most powerful defence against those who seek our destruction. Now that I'm back, I understand in my heart that, together, we are truly stronger.

Anti-Semitism will worsen

Professor, analyst and activist Ellen Cannon has issued a warning about a worldwide tide of anti-Semitism and anti-Americanism. "You haven't seen anything yet," she told several hundred people at a UJA Federation event. "Islamism (radical Islamic ideology) is much more dangerous than Nazism," she said. " A whole world is being influenced by a radical ideology."

According to Cannon, radical Islam not only seeks to destroy Israel, but also the United States, western democracies and virtually all Arab regimes – in fact, all nation-states, which would be replaced by Islamic rule. An Islamic state of Palestine, she said, would be "as anti-Christian as it is anti-Jewish." And, anti-Semitism, inspired by Islamic radicalism, she cautioned, is catching on. "Now it is legitimate to speak about Israel's existence in esoteric terms. Its future is no longer a certainty."

Cannon also outlined a three point plan to deal with this new threat: a massive communications campaign in the Arab world about the benefits of democracy; new programs in Arab society to teach entrepreneurship in order to break away from feudalism and political advocacy, particularly by building coalitions with Christians and other non-Jews.

Cannon, who holds a doctorate from the University of Massachusetts, is a frequent commentator on U.S. networks.

Israel's military power divisive force: historian

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel has a responsibility as a sovereign state to defend itself against aggression, but its exercise of military power has been a divisive force, historian Michael Oren said last week.

Michael Oren

In a speech at Holy Blossom Temple, Oren said this pattern has manifested itself since the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Virtually every Israeli "resort to power" since then has divided Israeli society and broken governments, said the author of Six Days of War, an account of the 1967 Six Day War.

Currently a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, Oren cited two examples of the divisiveness of Israeli power: Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon and its efforts to contain the first and current Palestinian uprisings.

"The dividing issue in Israel is [military] power," he said.

There are two exceptions to this axiom: Israel's waging of the Six Day War and its successful 1976 Entebbe raid to extricate Israeli passengers in Uganda whose Air France plane had been hijacked by Palestinian and European terrorists.

Military power, however, has not always worked against Israel's interests, he added. "Power [does] have its rewards."

Israel gained a 10-year respite from war after the 1956 Sinai campaign, and France helped Israel build a nuclear reactor.

But after the Six Day War, Israel relied too much on military power and indulged in a worship of generals, said Oren, a former paratrooper who left the United States more than 25 years ago to settle in Israel.

The current wave of Arab terrorism, which forces Israel to hit back, has reopened the debate on Israeli power, he said.

In a reference to the Israel Defence Forces, Oren said it is "too Jewish." Rather than levelling Palestinian villages after suicide bombings, the Israeli army erects checkpoints in the territories.

And in an effort to reduce the possibility of civilian casualties, Israel's general staff enters into lengthy debates over the advisability of using 500 or 1,000-pound bombs to kill terrorists.

On political power, he said, most rabbbinic sages have opposed the Jewish acquisition of such authority, considering it dangerous, foolish, profane and blasphemous.

And today, he pointed out, haredim usually oppose Zionism, the modern expression of Jewish power.

But power, military and political, is integral to Islam, said Oren. If Jews recoil from power, Muslims seek it out.

On a per capita basis, the intifadah has claimed as many lives as the Yom Kippur War, he said, adding that Israel increasingly serves as a focus of anti-Semitism.

Asked to comment on the Olso peace process, Oren dismissed it as "an old, disastrous idea" that has been tried without success since the 1930s.

Oslo, he said, represented yet another attempt to partition a land inhabited by Jews and Arabs – "yet another chapter in the belief that the Palestinians are willing to share Palestine."

But the Palestinians have repeatedly rejected this concept. And as a result, he is pessimsitic. As he put it, "I'm convinced there is no one on the other side to talk to."

Palestinian professions of interest in partition are misleading, he said, adding that Palestinians want to struggle against Israel by political and demographic means.

He said Israel faces a dilemma: it engenders bitterness among Palestinians and creates new terrorists by mounting reprisal raids, but if it fails to respond to provocations, it will leave the impression it is weak and vulnerable.

The security barrier Israel is currently building through the West Bank evokes images of the "ghetto wall" Zionism sought to dispel.

Yet if the barrier follows the pre-1967 lines, the Palestinians will conclude that Israel is weak and has succumbed to the threat of terrorism, he said.

Commenting on Israel's recent bombing of a Palestinian camp deep inside Syria, Oren said it was "long overdue" given Syria's support of terrorist groups such as Islamic Jihad and Hamas.

The United Nations Resolution 242, unanimously adopted in November 1967, has been universally misinterpreted, he said, since it calls on Israel to withdraw from "territories," not "the territories," and recognizes the right of all states in the region to defensible borders.

BUTTERFLIES: The grade 4 and 5 students at both campuses of The Leo Baeck Day School created butterflies to be sent to the Holocaust Museum in Houston for their Butterfly Project. The children remembered the children who were victims of the Holocaust by creating a colourful butterfly in the image that was evoked for them by their writings. These butterflies represent the dreams and hopes that Leo Baeck students believe had been held by the children in Terezin who had lost their lives. Palestinian solidarity conference proceeds uneventfully at U of T

By LEORA BERESKIN
Special to The CJN

A Palestinian solidarity conference proceeded uneventfully in a University of Toronto building Sunday, although it was originally cancelled by school officials because of its exclusionary nature.

The conference, which attracted approximately 80 people, took place at the Bahen Centre for Information Technology. It was originally to be held a week earlier in another U of T building, but was cancelled, not because of its possibly anti-Semitic or terrorist-endorsing inferences, but because university officials felt it excluded people who did not want to sign one of its registering documents, the Basis of Unity.

Jewish student felt 'pretty disheartened'

The Basis of Unity consisted of six points, including "Israel is a racist apartheid state," "The two-state solution is not a viable or acceptable option" and "We support the right of the Palestinian people to resist Israeli and colonialism by the means of their choosing." Under pressure from pro-Palestine protesters who claimed that their freedom of speech rights were being infringed upon, the university rescheduled the conference to Sunday.

One of the organizers of the event, Hazem Jamjoum, spoke to journalists about this last point, saying he abhors suicide bombers, but he believes that in a situation of oppression, anyone has a right to resist it.

He said violence has been used effectively many times in history to make a positive change.

The schedule included talks on "the realities and nature of Israeli apartheid" and "Zionist claims of 'diversity.'" It also discussed specific plans for action and events to be held in Toronto in the future.

The conference was organized by Al-Awda (the Palestine right to return coalition) and the Arab Student Council, and attracted a diverse crowd, including several individuals wearing buttons that read: "Jews Against Occupation."

A Jewish student who attended part of the conference said he left feeling "pretty disheartened."

Last Wednesday, people protested the cancellation of the conference by marching across the U of T campus.

Lawsuit fights repeal of tax credit

"In the best of all worlds, we would like the credit preserved. But we know that's not going to happen. We're painfully aware they campaigned against it. We're just hoping they'll phase it out in a humane way."

The OACS is suing Finance Minister Greg Sorbara and Attorney General Michael Bryant for not holding a referendum.

Lawyers for the government have argued the OACS motion should be dismissed because repealing a tax credit is not the same as raising taxes and is therefore not subject to the Taxpayers Protection Act. They have also argued that the recent provincial election amounted to a referendum on the issue and that the legislature could be paralyzed if the court interferes with government business.

CJC and the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools have been working to change the date of repeal to June 30, 2004.

Morgan said officials in the finance and education ministries have invited Congress and other interested parties to submit ideas for alternatives to the EETC.

He said two ideas are being considered. One would follow the models of funding private, faith-based schools in Quebec and British Columbia, where schools that follow the provincial curriculum receive grants based on certain criteria, including the number of pupils.

The other, which is in place in Alberta, is for private schools to affiliate with public school boards.

That was tried in the late 1970s, when Associated Hebrew Day Schools attempted unsuccessfully to affiliate with the North York Board of Education.

"We're willing to look at that again," Morgan said.

In a joint statement last week, CJC and the Islamic Society of North America (ISNA) "expressed considerable disappointment" at the Liberal plan to ax the EETC.

"We are very disappointed that the government has proceeded rashly and has retroactively killed the tax credit. Parents with children in independent schools made their financial decision on the basis of the tax credit applying for the full school year," Mohammad Ashraf, secretary general of ISNA Canada, said in a statement.

"Our parents are mostly average middle-income earners who were counting heavily on this tax credit in their household budget. I am frankly surprised that the government acted with such mean spirit. It was not necessary."

Morgan stated that he fully agrees with the Islamic group.

"We always understood that the premier supported funding to faith-based schools. In fact he voiced this support publicly to our executive only a few years ago. We hoped that the government would have offered another alternative to the tax credit. Now we non-Catholics in Ontario are once again the subjects of religious discrimination. This is not acceptable."

Bernie Farber, CJC Ontario region's executive director, said the Liberals' bill may very well be the first example in Canadian history of a retroactive cancellation of a tax break.

Jerusalem mayor enlists Canadian aid for economic recovery

In a bid to restore the city's economic viability, Lupolianski has established a forum to bring high-tech industry to Jerusalem and diversify its tourist-dependent economy.

While in Toronto, Lupolianski met with Gerry Schwartz, chief executive officer of Onex Corp., a multinational investment firm with a myriad of companies and thousands of employees around the world.

Rosen said Lupolianski invited Schwartz "to help us restore Jerusalem's economic health."

Schwartz promised to lead a Canadian delegation to Jerusalem in the near future, Rosen added.

In addition, Lupolianski met with with members of the Reichmann family, who are real estate investors and have close ties with Israel.

"The mayor's message is that we have to rebuild Jerusalem," said Rosen. "It's not charity."

Friendly and down-to-earth, Lupolianski expressed admiration for the spirit and steadfastness of Jerusalem's residents in the face of continual Arab terrorism.

In an effort to create a safer environment for its more than 600,000 citizens, one third of whom are Arabs, he asked Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to build a barrier around the city.

The security fence, scheduled to be completed by year's end, will protect the people of Jerusalem, he said.

"I have talked to professionals in the army and the police, and they have told me the fence will help secure Jerusalem and stop terrorism."

Lupolianski said he would ask Diaspora donors for funds to hire more security guards to safeguard schools and old-age homes.

As well, he plans to make city parks wheelchair accessible to victims of terrorism.

An ordained rabbi and the first haredi mayor of Jerusalem, he said he has every intention of preserving the religious status quo, and will not try to change the current balance between secular and observant Jews in the city.

"It's vital for Yerushalayim, the heart of Israel and of the Jewish people, to stand firm on the status quo so that everyone can live together in peace."

He has come under pressure from some haredi circles to increase the severity of religious laws, but he will not be moved.

"It's not an easy job, I know," he said, referring to his determination to serve all Jerusalemites. "I want to strengthen the bridges between various Jewish groups. I can make a unique contribution."

He added, "I don't want to step on anyone's foot. We have Jewish people, and Muslims and Christians, and the mayor is responsible for all of them. I will do my best to serve them."

Lupolianski denied reports that the Arab inhabitants of eastern Jerusalem receive poorer services than their Jewish counterparts.

"On a per-capita basis, we spend more money in Arabic districts than in Jewish neighbourhoods," he said, claiming that the infrastructure of Arab neighbourhoods was neglected by Jordan before the Six Day War in 1967.

He also hopes to beautify the city by adding more gardens.

Lupolianski, who paid a courtesy visit to Mel Lastman before his resignation as Toronto mayor earlier this week, was born in Haifa in 1951.

Elected a city council member in 1989, Lupolianski was appointed acting mayor last winter when the incumbent, Ehud Olmert, resigned to pursue a career in national politics. Olmert is currently minister of trade and industry and deputy prime minister.

In last June's municipal election, he defeated his opponent Nir Barkat by a relatively wide margin. His term of office is five years.

Before becoming mayor, Lupolianski – the father of twelve – was best known as the founder of Yad Sarah.

It is a nation-wide, non-profit medical aid organization that attends to the needs of the disabled, the sick and the elderly.

Accompanied by Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, Lupolianski reportedly drummed up support for Yad Sarah during his brief visit to Toronto.

Tales of Toronto's first Jewish shvitz chronicled

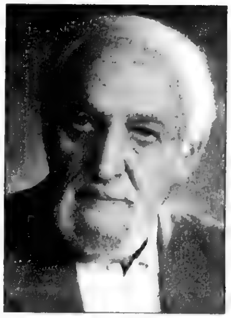
By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Norman Bornstein, 90, remembers growing up at his grandfather's Russian Turkish Steam Bath at 36 Centre Ave. in downtown Toronto.



Norman Bornstein

Ten years ago, he began documenting his memories of his mother's father, Mendel Riman, but then put his papers away. Last February, after 66 years of marriage, his wife Lillian died.

"I was very lonely, and I looked for things to do, and the opportunity came along for me to look at the draft of my grandfather's story and to begin writing again," he says.

Sara Edell Kelman brought Bornstein back to his writing. Kelman had begun writing the history of her own family and discovered that her father, Pesach Edell, was a relative of Mendel Riman. While conducting her research, Kelman contacted Bornstein, and last year, she agreed to work with him on writing his memoir.

"I was excited and fascinated by Norman's story," Kelman says. "I felt that it was a valuable piece of Toronto Jewish archival history."

In his brief but nostalgic short story, titled Hot Rocks: The Story of the First Jewish Steam Bath in Toronto, Bornstein describes the central role Riman's baths played in his life.

Mendel Riman

Born in an apartment above the shvitz (steam bath), his father died in a car accident when he was eight years old. He and his mother moved in with her parents on Brunswick Avenue and Bornstein began working at the steam baths as a teenager.

Born in 1865, Riman came to Toronto from Galicia in 1900.

"My grandfather was a smart man, and he opened the steam bath because he didn't want to work on Shabbat," Bornstein says.

At that time, there was a steady trickle of Jews arriving from eastern Europe.

"They needed to find work and lodgings. Helping organizations had not been formed yet, so it took individuals like my grandfather to fill the void," Bornstein says, adding that his grandfather's bath was probably the forerunner of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society.

Hundreds of rag and bottle pedlars, bookmakers, swindlers, racketeers, rabbis, cantors and businessmen found their way to Riman's baths, and Riman was always ready to help the new immigrants find their way in the new world, Bornstein says.

In Hot Rocks, Bornstein describes how the ovens for the baths were set up, how the steam was made and the bazems – bouquets of oak leaves – were prepared.

"More than likely, my grandfather used his own creative talent. He came up with what was to become the forerunner of the present day spas and health clubs."

The history of Toronto in the early 1900s unfolds in Hot Rocks as Bornstein describes his family life, the growth of the city and the characters who came to the shvitz.

Bornstein, who went to Landsdowne Public School and Harbord Collegiate, began working at the baths when he was 14. He says the number of customers increased and included jockeys who came regularly to lose weight for a race the following day.

He describes Saturday nights as full of "fights, smokers, stags, floating crap and poker games." Those days, he says, there was horseracing, basketball and hockey, "before Hockey Night in Canada. The bookies were busy with all the events." He even describes a so-called "new sport," cockroach races.

Even cold pop was available, and later, customers could order in a corned beef or pastrami sandwich for five cents.

As the Jewish community moved north, many of Riman's customers, particularly those who didn't have cars, began to drop away. One former customer built a new modern steam bath on Bathurst Street just south of College Street.

The business faltered with the stock market crash of 1929, the disintegration of the oven and many unforeseen costs. The family lost the business in 1933 when they were unable to pay the interest on a $4,000 mortgage. Riman died in 1945.

Bornstein, a retired broadcast producer and sales trainer, says that when he told people he was Riman's grandson, "I was embraced and told how wonderful my zaide had been to them. This great man, my grandfather, who helped unknown numbers of immigrants, also took into his home his widowed daughter, my mother and her two little children raising us as his own sons.

"This was my zaide and I am very proud of him. He deserves a place in the story of the Jews of Toronto."

Bornstein, who served in the Canadian Air Force during World War II, says, "I've had ups and downs in my life but I've enjoyed every minute. The downs have taught me to enjoy the ups even more."

For more information on Hot Rocks, call Bornstein at 416-635-9570.

Seniors learn to get computers up and running

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Twelve future cyber bubbies and zaides sat on ergonomic chairs at their 17-inch flat-panel monitor displays in the new Computer Learning & Resource Centre at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living on a recent Monday morning.

Assisted by an instructor and three volunteers, they were learning how to surf the Net in an Internet Explorer class, one of nine computer classes offered at the centre each week to more than 100 students aged 55 and up.

The state-of-the-art computer centre was part of an extensive renovation to the more than 20-year-old building at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue. To participate in the computer programs, you must be a member of the Betel Centre.

"There's a technology gap between seniors and young people," says program co-ordinator Jennifer Paquette.

The classes meet for two hours a week and all sessions last eight weeks. The cost is $45 for the eight sessions, but the program is funded in part by a two-year operating grant from the Trillium Foundation and by members of the Betel board of directors. This enables the Computer Learning & Resource Centre to offer spaces in each class for scholarships based on financial need and the desire to learn.

"We are committed to making this available to everybody, regardless of their ability to pay," Paquette says.

The roster includes several beginners classes, including two given entirely in Russian. Paquette says she anticipates that this will change over time.

"We'll open up more and different types of classes at the intermediate and advanced levels. We'll grow as our students do."

Each class begins with a 15-minute review, and the computer centre has open lab time for practice throughout the week.

The atmosphere is friendly as the volunteer teaching assistants help the students and the students help each other. The instructor, who that morning was Cary Weinberg, a professional computer teacher at Centennial College and the Toronto District School Board, works on a computer that is connected to a projector where the large screen reflects each step of the program.

Weinberg says learning the computer gives seniors a chance to access the outside world via Internet and e-mail.

"I love teaching seniors," Weinberg says. "They remind me of my bubbies and zaides. I find they are terrific students. They are attentive and eager to learn." This was evident when many of the students did not leave their computers during the 10-minute break offered.

Paquette says that in seeking volunteers, the program "isn't so much looking for people with technical skills as [seeking] caring, compassionate individuals with lots of patience, who understand how scary it is to be trying something new. Volunteering is a great opportunity for recently retired individuals to keep using workplace computer skills."

Paquette, who also teaches two classes, says her challenge is to prepare the lessons at a beginners level. "Libraries and the boards of education have computer sessions, but they are not geared for seniors."

Arthur Adler, 85, a veteran of the British army says he is now living alone, and "I am playing with my computer."

Student Dorothy Weiner says, "My objective is to be comfortable with e-mail so I can keep in touch with my nieces and nephews in Israel. I love getting picture of the baby and keeping up to date with my family."

Weiner adds that she came to the computer class "because I was tired of being frustrated. I'm beginning to see the light."

The next courses begins on Jan. 5. Registration is required. The Web site is www.betelcentre.org/clrc, or you can call Jennifer Paquette at 416-225 2112, ext. 128.

Hillel-endorsed slate wins York student elections

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The votes are in, and – unofficially, at least – the slate of candidates endorsed by Hillel has swept elections for the York Federation of Students.

Paul Cooper was elected YFS president, winning 907 votes (31 per cent), while opponents Derek Abdul Salick and Ali Hassan received 768 (about 27 per cent) and 470 (14 per cent) votes respectively. Erica-Joy Henry and Jeffrey Granell, also running for president, received 492 and 260 votes respectively.

Cooper headed a 31-member slate, the first ever to be endorsed by Hillel at York University. Twenty-seven members of his team, including the entire executive slate, were elected. The new president will also appoint students to four positions that are unfilled because nobody ran for them.

As of last Friday, the results were not official because they had not yet been ratified by the YFS council.

"I feel fantastic. It's great," said a jubilant Cooper last Friday, the morning after election results were announced. "This is a victory for all students across Canada and anywhere who feel student government isn't representing them. We're not here to represent Jews. We're here to represent all students."

Talia Klein, director of Hillel at York, was "absolutely ecstatic" over Cooper's win.

She noted that many of the candidates who did not win congratulated Cooper's team – and very graciously.

"I hope this will serve as a basis for some partnerships."

Cooper's campaign had been plagued by unpleasant incidents including defacement of his election posters with graffiti and a "Hitler moustache," as well as the disqualification of one candidate for council who slandered Cooper and his slate at a Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights event.

Paul Cooper

According to Cooper, there is also an elections committee hearing pending, based on a complaint by other candidates that his slate misrepresented its spending. He is confident that the evidence shows "clearly and without question" that there was no wrongdoing.

Cooper is known on campus as president of the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP), a grassroots, right-wing organization. He told The CJN he wants to clarify that the YZP is "not extremist. The right-wing label comes with a lot of assumptions that don't apply to us. We believe in a two-state solution. My politics are in line with peace."

For the moment, he said, his YZP presidency is "temporarily suspended" until he finds out whether he would be allowed to continue in that capacity as well as serving as YFS president.

The YFS presidency takes priority, he said. The first thing he intends to do is reduce the $20,000 salaries of the four YFS executive members by 10 per cent. "That will save $8,000. I think security cameras or lights can better serve the students."

Cooper's platform, Progress Not Politics, was based on taking the YFS focus off political activity, such as its funding of a new union newspaper with anti-Israel material, to concentrate on more general student issues.

U of T student newspaper issues apology

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Gargoyle, the bi-weekly student-run newspaper of University College at the University of Toronto, has issued a letter of apology to the Jewish community after an anti-Semitic note by the editors appeared in its Nov. 21 edition.

The papers were pulled off newsstands immediately following complaints by two members of Hillel at the University of Toronto.

"There is no excuse for the careless and offensive comments," the editors said in the letter. "The comment was a mistake, and highlights failings in our editorial policy which will be addressed by the university in an internal campus investigation as well as by our own editors. In addition, the Gargoyle has suspended publication until this matter is resolved."

The comment, which stated "…shut the f up, you stupid greedy Jew," appeared following an article by a Jewish student that included a criticism of a cartoon that appeared in the previous paper.

Part of a series called "Adventures in Objectivism," the cartoon depicted two men, with one carrying a bag of money and wearing a black hat and sideburns. The Jewish student questioned whether the artist had meant to portray the character as a Jewish Shylock.

The editorial note defended the cartoon and concluded with the anti-Semitic slur.

The paper's letter of apology said the comment "was absolutely not intended to be hateful… It was made within the context of an ongoing ironic dialogue between the Gargoyle and one of its writers, but it absolutely crossed the line between satirical commentary and language plainly unsuited for publication anywhere.

"As a newspaper, we all hope that this episode can be used as a springboard for a constructive and, ultimately, positive dialogue about issues of cultural discrimination, and that the Jewish communities on campus and beyond can forgive us for our egregious and shameful error."

"I think the whole thing has been handled very well," said Lisa Isen Baumal, director of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, who met with Paul Perron, principal of University College, the day of the incident. She said she was "very satisfied" that the matter was handled quickly and taken seriously by the university's administration. She doesn't believe the paper had any malicious intent.

But Hillel members Johanna Herman and Elanna Mosoff, who lodged the complaint, want the editorial board of the Gargoyle to step down. Herman, Hillel's public relations co-ordinator, said regardless of the editors' intent in publishing the comment, what matters is "how people took it." Several students were in tears, she said.

OLMERT MOBBED: Deputy Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, standing fourth from right, met last month with student activists from the Betar-Tagar world student Zionist movement at the home of Rachelle and David Bronfman in Toronto. Olmert told them that "students who fight for Israel on university campuses are almost as important as the Israeli soldiers who fight terror." Pictured with Olmert and the students are Betar-Tagar shaliach Itay Gadot, standing to Olmert's right, and Rachelle Bronfman, standing second from left. The event was sponsored by Betar-Tagar, Herut-Likud of Canada and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

York U students protest speech by ex-CIA head

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Former CIA director James Woolsey and Dale Watson, former executive assistant director of the FBI's counter-terrorism unit, attracted vocal demonstrations last week outside their lecture at York University's Burton Auditorium.

Protesters from several groups, including Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, carried signs that denounced the CIA as "Criminals In Action" and objected to having "racists" and "military" on campus.

Some of the protesters engaged in heated arguments with Jewish students. One woman used a megaphone to demand that Paul Cooper, president of the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP) and a candidate for president in last week's York Federation of Students elections, explain why his group helped organize the event, sarcastically calling him "Mr. No Politics" in reference to his election platform, which called for the YFS to de-emphasize political activity.

"He doesn't represent us if he's bringing the CIA on campus," she yelled.

The protesters did not, however, prevent Woolsey and Watson from delivering their talk, titled "Israel and the War on Terror: the Insiders' Perspective," to a mostly Jewish audience of about 300 people. It was sponsored by the YZP along with Hillel of Greater Toronto, Betar-Tagar and Hadar: the Morris and Rose Lax Centre, which is based in Hamilton.

Students have the right to protest, said Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto. "That's democracy."

Watson was even more enthusiastic. "I think that's great," he said in the question-and-answer period. "It goes back to freedom of assembly and the right for people to protest, values that inside the United States, we hold near and dear. I would not like to see that changed."

In his talk, Woolsey said that winning what he calls "the long war of the 21st century" will involve convincing "a rather important share of the world that this is not about a clash of civilizations, religions or countries, but that it is a war of freedom against tyranny, just as we convinced important people behind the Iron Curtain" of the same thing during the Cold War. Today, he noted, the world has 121 democracies, compared to 20 in 1945.

The task won't be easy and it won't end with an arms control agreement, Woolsey said, but he believes democracy and the rule of law will prevail.

"This is a war to the death. We need to understand that, or we will not be able to fight it successfully."

Fascists and Islamists don't "hate us for what we're doing wrong. They hate us for what we do right," Woolsey said. "We are hated, indeed loathed, for freedom of speech, freedom of religion, equal treatment of women – or almost equal, and for open economies."

An open society and participation in the global economy, with businesspeople travelling throughout the world, makes the West vulnerable to attack, Watson said. But if people change the way they do business in order to protect themselves, "we will not be better off than some of the [non-democratic] countries," he said.

There is a "large debate" going on in the United States about how to deal with security, privacy and civil rights issues, he said.

In Europe, Woolsey said, anti-Semitism among the media and cultural elite is a "very serious problem.

"I am convinced that anti-Semitism is for a lot of people the first breath of totalitarianism."

He suggested that audience members tell their non-Jewish friends that "you love liberty. Once anti-Semitism raises its head, the rest of us who don't want to live with a foot on the back of our necks are likely to be the next targets."

Western's JSU part of multifaith Ramadan event

LONDON, Ont. – About 10 members of the Jewish Student Union at the University of Western Ontario took part in a multi-faith dinner recently at Brescia University College, which is affiliated with the school.

"It was a really cool event," said JSU president Gary Diamond of the second annual Cross Faith Ramadan Dinner held at Brescia.

The dinner – originally organized by Mariam Abdo, last year's vice-president, administration of Brescia's Students' Council – to encourage dialogue, brought together the Muslim Students' Association, the JSU and the Christian Unity Committee.

"We came out of respect for each other and to learn about each other's religions," said Diamond. "Once you start learning about each other, that's when you start breaking down barriers and moving in the correct direction."

Vancouver CJA campaign on pace for record year

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver has announced that more than $3.4 million has been pledged to the 2003 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, making it more than halfway to its $6 million target.

"This year, we are aiming for $6 million in the annual campaign in a community that historically has raised about $4 million per year, and only last year arrived at the $4.5 million benchmark," said Arnie Fine, president of Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV).

"We have set this aggressive goal in order to mobilize our community to respond to the dramatic world events that are having such a tremendous and difficult impact on Jews in Israel and in many places around the world."

The theme of the 2003 CJA campaign – meant to evoke the worldwide rise in terrorism, anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism – is "What will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?"

Funds will go to a variety of programs and services that support Israel and Jewish communities worldwide, including: strengthening Israel's deteriorating social services network; helping to combat the increase in anti-Israel hatred and anti-Semitism; assisting communities in distress; providing Jewish youth with the tools to defend Jews and Israel; and investing in Greater Vancouver's growing Jewish community.

One million dollars has been earmarked for defending Israel and Judaism. In Israel, for example, the Israel Crisis Management Centre – SELAH in Hebrew – will receive CJA funds.

Founded by Ruth Bar-On in 1993, SELAH is a mobile network of some 500 volunteers that assists new immigrants in crisis. It has helped more than 9,000 new Israelis, including many bereaved and wounded who have been affected by ongoing Palestinian violence.

In the Lower Mainland, the 2003 CJA campaign will, among other initiatives, strengthen services to Jewish students in local post-secondary institutions. Eyal Lichtmann, executive director of Vancouver Hillel, said that "since September 2002, Vancouver Hillel has worked with Jewish students to address the dramatic increase in anti-Israel propaganda on campuses, especially at the University of British Columbia and Simon Fraser University.'

Vancouver Hillel has set up Israel advocacy clubs at UBC, SFU and Langara College. The clubs, which conduct pro-Israel programming on campus, are open to all university and college students.

"Vancouver Hillel has created a very specific strategy for engaging non-Jewish student support on campus," Lichtmann said. "[We believe] that the non-Jewish and unaffiliated populations on campus, who have no opinion on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, can be educated to become supporters of Israel."

Lichtmann said that by engaging with non-partisan group, Vancouver Hillel will be in a better position to have a positive impact on campus debates about the conflict.

"In the past eight months, Hillel advocacy groups on campus have recruited [many] non-Jewish students," Lichtmann said. "[They] now represent approximately 30 per cent of the combined Israel advocacy clubs at UBC and SFU. The non-Jewish members of the Israel advocacy clubs at UBC and SFU are now some of the strongest supporters of Israel on campus, despite the fact these students have never visited Israel."

The Greater Vancouver initiative is part of an effort by Jewish communities across Canada to raise $11 million to respond to the crisis facing Jews around the world.

Amnesia rules when it comes to the Middle East

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict continually challenges journalists to write with consistency. Unfortunately, the issues that correspondents or commentators cover one month are all too often forgotten the next. Just as readily forgotten is history itself. The events of just three years ago are too ancient to resonate in today's media coverage.

Let's be specific. Revisionist accounts aside, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's rejection of the Camp David and Clinton bridging proposals of the summer and fall of 2000 – which offered the Palestinians a state in the West Bank, Gaza and parts of Jerusalem – has been an unmitigated disaster for both Palestinians and Israelis. Arafat, who has proven himself incapable of making peace with Israel, remains in charge of the PA. This recent history has been forgotten by far too many journalists.

In "Suicidal Lies," a March 31, 2002 New York Times column that remains essential reading, Thomas Friedman argued that the Palestinians have resorted to violence and terrorism not out of desperation under occupation, but rather as a strategic decision. (Indeed, this choice has proven so successful that Palestinian opinion polls found recently that even if Israel were to withdraw to the 1967 border – which was actually an armistice line – 60 per cent of Palestinians would still support terrorism within Israel proper.)

Today, however, amnesia rules. In Friedman's Nov. 16 New York Times column, "A Saudi-Israeli Deal," his target is Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who, Friedman wrote, "prefer[s] to buy time by relying on police rather than political initiatives."

Friedman criticizes Sharon for not offering former Palestinian prime minister Mahmoud Abbas enough incentives to enable him to act against Palestinian terrorist groups, as demanded by the internationally sponsored road map peace plan. Friedman then calls for a revival of the Clinton plan. Never mind that in the past, Friedman has lamented Arafat's refusal of that plan. What makes him think Arafat would accept it today?

Friedman also forgets Arafat's role in creating the ongoing impasse. Arafat undermined Abbas, just as he undermined the new PA prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, by insisting on control of all PA security services and by placing a crony in the interior ministry. Yet Sharon is expected to come up with a political initiative that will break the stalemate – almost as if Arafat and the Palestinians' rejection of Jewish sovereignty in the Middle East plays no role whatsoever.

Similar, one-sided coverage is found in most reports about recent non-governmental peace plans, including the Yossi Beilin-Yassar Abed Rabbo "Geneva Accord" and an initiative led by Ami Ayalon and Sari Nusseibeh. Sharon, under domestic pressure to show some progress toward peace, is now talking about making unilateral moves, such as removing some isolated settlements. Few if any reporters look at the other side of the equation. What can the Palestinians do, especially with Arafat still in control?

In a Nov. 20 Jerusalem Post article titled "It Takes Two To Partition," Israeli journalist and writer Yossi Klein Halevi injected a needed measure of cold sobriety into the discussion. Given the current Palestinian realities, wrote Klein Halevi, "the Oslo-era notion of a comprehensive peace needs to be wiped from our lexicon. Instead, we should conceive not of resolving the conflict but of managing its intensity." Only after the intensity of the current conflict subsides and a real peace partner emerges can Israel successsfully pursue the comprehensive and lasting peace it has longed for since its creation, Klein Halevi argued.

Klein Halevi's appraisal is bleak, but even for those who favour a two-state solution and understand the urgency to preserve Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, it is a realistic assessment of where we stand. Unlike the impatient Friedman, Klein Halevi presents a consistent, logical analysis, one that's in keeping with the historical record.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Internet hate sites now ‘hate and terror’ sites: expert

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL –Web sites that used to merely advocate hate are now also spewing calls to violence, says an Internet hate expert.

“I call these ‘hate and terror’ sites,” Leo Adler told an audience during the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre’s recent Holocaust lecture series.

Leo Adler

Adler, the director of the Simon Wiesenthal Center’s national affairs department in Toronto and the son of Holocaust survivors, displayed a slew of Internet images as part of his presentation.

Holocaust denial and white supremacist sites – such as those belonging to Storm Front, the Ku Klux Klan and the National Alliance – that have been around for years still exist.

The difference now is the proliferation of extremist Muslim sites that excoriate Jews and Israel, instruct on suicide bomb-making and glorify 9/11, Adler said. Others show how to build a car bomb and celebrate “martyrdom.” Another refers to the “blood of the dirty Jews,” and still another uses freedom-of-expression arguments as a cover to promulgate hate.

“Before the Internet, the only way to get things out was by word-of-mouth or by flyers,” Adler said. “That helped good ideas get disseminated while making it more difficult for hate groups.”

Because the Internet is virtually unregulated, it is easy for such groups not only to instantly spread their message all over the world, but also to win a measure of “instant credibility” simply by being online, he said.

The access is unparalleled. Adler said there are close to 600 million people around the world who have access to nine million sites.

Of those nine million, Adler said, the Simon Wiesenthal Center has so far identified about 4,000 that fall under the “hate on the Internet” category.

There are less than a handful of servers based in Canada because of stringent anti-hate laws that have forced such notorious figures as Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel to stop operating his site from inside the country, he said.

But, he added, all someone has to do is move their server over the border to the United States – as Zundel did – where freedom of speech is more broadly defined.

“Anyone can be a hatemonger,” Adler said. “But it’s often a cat-and-mouse game to figure out where the servers are located.”

With the growth of radicalism in all forms around the world, he said, it’s not only Jews, blacks, homosexuals and other minorities who are subject to Internet hate. Nowadays, America, abortionists and western values can be targeted.

“Hate comes in all forms, and all can be targets,” Adler said.

Often, he said, the hate is insidious. Open up certain sites that purport to be about freedom of speech, civil rights or tolerance, and a few links later, the real agenda unfolds.

“This is how they attract individuals,” Adler said. “You go on [the search engine] Google, and these things turn up.”

These sites generally try to attract the young and impressionable, he said. One site he displayed has a suicide bomber video game aimed at children called Kaboom. The player wins by killing the most victims as the suicide bomber’s head blows off.

The most important thing to remember about hate on the Internet, Adler said, is to be conscious of it and “recognize it even when it’s disguised.”

Advocacy groups sign on for change

Community federations from across Canada have agreed to the new arrangement. At the end of the three-year period, there will be an evaluation to determine whether the arrangement has been effective. The changes are expected to be fully in place and operational within two months, Finkelstein said.

The initiative for a major restructuring of community advocacy efforts began with the creation of an emergency cabinet of prominent business leaders who believed Jewish organizations were not making a strong enough case for Israel and not responding sufficiently to anti-Semitism on campus and in the broader community.

The emergency cabinet, for its part, has been criticized for attempting to centralize control over community advocacy organizations. The cabinet includes some of Canada's most prominent businesspeople, including Gerald Schwartz (Onex), Larry Tanenbaum (Toronto Maple Leafs and Toronto Raptors), Stephen Reitman (Reitmans clothing) and Brent Belzberg (Harrowston and Torquest Partners). It also included the late Izzy Asper (CanWest Global).

The cabinet was also criticized for conducting negotiations with UIA Federations Canada behind closed doors.

Canadian Jewish Congress officials were concerned at the onset of deliberations that the organization's unique structure would be lost in the new scheme. Congress president Keith Landy said, "At the beginning there were individuals, not necessarily from CIJA, who wanted to undermine the strength of Congress as the official voice of the Jewish community. There were who those through jealousy or [because they] held other views wanted to change the way the community lobbied.

"There are those who believe their organization would be enhanced with a diminishment of Congress."

In the end, Congress was satisfied with the outcome of talks. Under the new arrangement, it will retain its independent structure as an umbrella organization of community groups from across the country.

"We have an understanding in place," Landy said. "There is a resolution of issues and we look forward to working with them.

"Congress will continue to retain its governance structure" and "we will participate in the over-arching, supervisory role in the CIJA board."

Landy said individuals with Congress affiliation – though not Congress appointees – will also serve on CIJA's board.

Landy said with the promised increase in resources – which he had been advocating for years – Congress will be better able to improve relations with other ethnic groups.

"It's a matter of putting together a program that will promote civil discourse and understanding in conformity with Canadian values," he said.

As to the role of CIJA in Congress' future, "we've agreed to be more accountable through the program delivery process… They want measurable results."

Shimon Fogel, the CIC's national executive director, said most issues concerning the transition have been resolved, though a few "technical" matters remain outstanding.

"Those uncomfortable with it remain uncomfortable; those who want to elevate our advocacy efforts are excited," Fogel said.

CIC will remain an agency of the Jewish community, operating through UIA Federations Canada and CIJA.

"Our budget is to be vetted through CIJA. They will apply criteria to assure CIC's budget and undertakings are consistent with community desires."

The CIC will have its own board consisting of ad personam appointments, Fogel said. In the past, CIC was a partnership of Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, community federations and the Canadian Zionist Federation. B'nai Brith is shut out of the new organizational arrangement.

Fogel said CIC has submitted a budget proposal "that goes well beyond doubling CIC's resources."

The organization expects to add staff and continue to bring political leaders and opinion-makers to Israel on missions, he said. Last week's mission of business leaders headed by former Ontario premier Mike Harris and former Newfoundland premier Brian Tobin was organized by the group.

For CIC, the biggest change will be the availability of new resources and support systems.

"The community will have a substantially more co-ordinated voice and it will have a louder voice informed by strategic coordination," Fogel said.

CIC will expand its one-year young leadership development program, in which volunteers are schooled in the Canadian political system. Last year, about 20 enrolled in the pilot project and more than 70 across Canada are participating this year. More cooperation can be expected between advocacy groups to assist campus organizations to better make the case for Israel, Fogel said.

"There will be a joint management of issues to ensure we cover all the bases and bring added value approach in a more coordinated way," he said, adding that ultimately, all the changes will be judged by results.

Why is Arafat silent?

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The Israeli-Palestinian diplomatic arena is abuzz with meetings, conferences, initiatives, even documents of mutual agreement. The most important meetings of all were between MK Omri Sharon and attorney Dov Weisglass, the most trusted associates of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, and Saeb Erekat and Jibril Rajoub, who are currently considered the closest public figures to PA President Yasser Arafat.

They are preparing for Sharon's meeting with PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia. There have also been other, less important, meetings of MKs from coalition and opposition factions with members of the Palestinian Legislative Council and high-ranking PA officials.

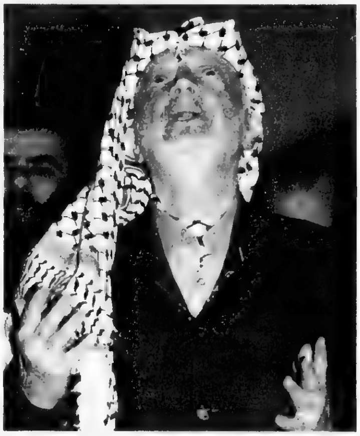
The envoys of the Sharon government were presumably spurred to hold talks with high-ranking Palestinians by the initiative of Yossi Beilin and Yasser Abed Rabbo, who on Monday were set to celebrate the signing of their document of understanding along with hundreds of invited guests in Geneva.

The official position of the government of Israel on the Geneva Accord is well known: out-and-out rejection. But the official Palestinian position is slightly more complex. Negotiations on the initiative were carried out by Palestinian officials who have served as cabinet ministers in previous Arafat governments (Abed Rabbo, Hisham Abdel Razeq, and Nabil Qassis), as well as by another group of advisors who no doubt consulted Arafat every step of the way. When the identity of the Palestinian negotiators was made public, many members of the Palestinian leadership let it be known that the document was largely the product of Arafat's initiative.

That being the case, it was a little strange to see Arafat and his associates avoid any open and explicit support for the accord. On one occasion, in answer to a journalist's question, Arafat said publicly that he had no objections to any initiative that would lead to a resumption of the "path of the peace of the brave." But leaks from internal discussions indicate that he is issuing contrary statements about the Geneva document. Sometimes he is in favour, but at other times he adopts a negative stance. This is classic Arafat behaviour. He prefers to wait and see which way the winds of public opinion are blowing.

In the meantime, Palestinian opposition groups – primarily Hamas – and refugee organizations have initiated publicity, conferences and demonstrations against the Geneva Accord. It was reported last Saturday that there was a protest in Ramallah against Yasser Abed Rabbo and that unidentified persons even fired at his home. Demonstrations were also held in Gaza and Nablus. Among the organizers were Fatah movement activists who distributed sharply worded broadsheets condemning the deal. Feelings reached such a boiling point that many of the high-ranking Palestinians who would have left Sunday to take part in the ceremonies in Geneva elected to cancel their participation.

Some Palestinian newspaper columnists came out in support of the initiative, but quite a few others expressed reservations about it. One notable column that appeared in Al Quds on Nov. 7, written by Palestinian National Council member Waleed al-Awad, carried the headline: "The Geneva Accord liquidates the right of return." And one of the preachers in the Al Aqsa mosque told the masses of worshippers on the first Friday of Ramadan that the negotiators of the Geneva Accord achieved nothing but granting legitimacy to the Israeli occupation.



Yasser Arafat

When Arafat's staff were asked recently why they have remained silent and allowed opponents of the accord to shape Palestinian public opinion, they answered that the signers of the accord on the Israeli side are private individuals from an opposition minority, and therefore official senior PA officials must not intervene.

But this does not seem to be the whole truth. Arafat is afraid to express open and clear support for the document because if he does, many in the Palestinian public would rise up against him. They would tell him that he was being hasty to concede the right of return – a holy asset among Palestinians – and they would ask him what he is getting in return – the completion of the separation fence and the strengthening of the settlements. In other words, they would say, "You made an agreement with a few Israeli leftists and the Sharon government is ridiculing them and you."

For now, it doesn't seem the flurry of diplomatic activity of the past few weeks will lead to any sort of result.

Nearly half of all Holocaust survivors are in Israel

By SHLOMO SHAMIR and AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than one million Holocaust survivors remain in the world today, and almost half of them live in Israel, says a new study by Prof. Sergio DellaPergola of the Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry at Hebrew University.

DellaPergola, a leading expert in the field of Jewish demography, found that the number of remaining Holocaust survivors is far higher than previously believed.

According to the report, 1,092,000 Holocaust survivors are currently living around the world. Of this number, about 511,000 (47 per cent) are living in Israel. Previous studies on the subject estimated the total number of survivors did not exceed 900,000. These studies related to figures from 1997, while DellaPergola's report refers to 2003.

In his report, DellaPergola explains the discrepancies by saying the estimates in the earlier studies did not include Jews from North African and Middle Eastern countries – Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, Syria, Lebanon and Libya – who had lived under the occupation of Germany or its allies.

He also said earlier studies were based on inconsistent data.

In the wake of DellaPergola's findings, senior Jewish sources in New York have said the new figures will require significant changes to the distribution of humanitarian aid to survivors.

The geographic dispersion of the Holocaust survivors, the sources say, has significant influence on the way hundred of millions of dollars are shared among survivors.

New York Federal Court Judge Edward Korman, who is in charge of distributing money from dormant Swiss bank accounts, has ruled that funds left unclaimed by account owners will be used for humanitarian aid to Holocaust survivors.

> The sums in question are huge. Until now, Korman has allocated more than $250 million (US) to Holocaust survivors.

The sums in question are huge. Until now, Korman has allocated more than $250 million (US) to Holocaust survivors. He is expected to decide soon how hundreds of millions of dollars more are to be distributed.

According to the formula determined by Korman, survivors living in the former Soviet republics receive two-thirds of the total amount in humanitarian aid, with the remaining one-third being shared out among the rest of the survivors around the world. The formula is based on two criteria: the number of Holocaust survivors living in a specific country and the economic situation of the survivors.

The money is not transferred directly to the survivors, but goes instead to aid organizations – the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in the former Soviet republics, and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany in the rest of the world.

But according to DellaPergola's study, Holocaust survivors in Russia and the Commonwealth of Independent States constitute only 17 per cent (13.4 per cent in the CIS, and 2.9 percent in Russia) of the total number of survivors around the world.

Until now, survivors in Israel have received only about 10 per cent of the total amount distributed in humanitarian aid.

"It is not right for the lion's share of the aid to be transferred to Russia and the CIS when [so many] Holocaust survivors are living in Israel," a senior Jewish source in New York said.

Korman's allocation formula has sparked much criticism from survivors in Israel and North America, as well as from institutions such as the Jewish Agency and the government, who have demanded that survivors in Israel get a larger percentage of the funds.

The Jewish Agency has demanded that 20 per cent of the total be reserved for Holocaust commemoration activities and operations.

London meeting yields little

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Closed-door meetings between senior Israeli and Palestinian officials held outside of London late last week failed to reach an agreement.

The discussions included confidants of the leaders on both sides, including MK Omri Sharon, who is also Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's son, and Yasser Arafat's security adviser, Jibril Rajoub.

Omri Sharon has served as his father's envoy in the past.

Though no diplomatic inroads were made during the meetings, the mere fact that they were held was viewed as noteworthy. The meetings took place amid a flurry of diplomatic activity, both official and unofficial, on the Israeli-Palestinian front.

Sharon and Rajoub began the conference by trading accusations, the London-based Arabic newspaper Al Hayat reported.

Sharon said the Palestinians had done nothing to stop terror attacks on Israelis, adding: "Until something is done, we cannot advance."

Rajoub responded that a ceasefire could not be effective until a number of Israeli operations stopped.

"It is illogical to expect resistance to cease before occupation and settlement activities cease," he is reported to have said.

Labor lawmaker Ephraim Sneh, a participant in the meetings, told Israel Radio from London that the talks were held, in part, so that "the top echelons of the British government in the defence and political arenas would be able to learn first-hand of the situation between us and the Palestinians and what can be done."

The British Foreign Office sent representatives to the conference, but Baroness Symons, the minister responsible for the Middle East, was unable to attend.

She cancelled at the last minute and was replaced by a senior figure, a Foreign Office spokesperson told JTA.

The Foreign Office provided the meeting place but did not sponsor the event, which was organized by the Labor Friends of Israel lobbying group and the Yigal Allon Educational Trust, and was billed as a Rabin Peace Seminar, named after slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Sessions included discussions on the role of the international community in promoting a settlement, military threats to stability in the region and the role economics might play in fostering political rapprochement.

Ya'acov Herzog, a Labor legislator who attended the talks, told the Israeli daily Ma'ariv that "the very fact political and professional figures from both sides were there is in itself a significant achievement."

The event came at a busy time for talks aimed at restarting serious negotiations.

The U.S. assistant secretary for Near Eastern affairs, William Burns, was in the Mideast over the weekend, meeting with both Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qurei.

In addition, supporters of the unofficial "Geneva accord" were scheduled to sign it Monday in Switzerland.

Sharon has disavowed the accord, which was engineered by out-of-office Israeli politicians and leading Palestinians.

The Israeli prime minister is reported to be planning to meet Qureia, his Palestinian counterpart, soon.

31% of Israelis back Geneva Accord, 38% opposed

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — According to a Ha'aretz survey published Sunday, a day ahead of a planned launch of a public campaign endorsing he Geneva Accord, the gap between its supporters and opponents is rather small, with 31 per cent in favour of the peace plan and 38 per cent against it.

The accord, formulated by Yossi Beilin (and others in the Israeli peace camp) and Palestinan negotiators, provides a detailed outline for he establishment of a Palestinian state and includes unprecedented concessions by both sides.

Some 20 per cent of respondents said they had yet to form a definite opinion on the deal, nd a portion said they are likely to support it in he future. This group is likely to follow the Geneva signing ceremony and will also wait to see how the debate pans out in the Palestinian treet.

Another key finding is that 13 per cent of Likud voters support the Geneva Accord, which ll Likud leaders from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon downward, have vehemently opposed.

The poll, conducted for Ha'aretz by the Dilogue survey company, found that 21 per cent f Likud voters expressed support for the Geneva igning ceremony (overall, the ceremony was upported by 37 per cent of those polled).

As well, not all Likud voters agree with the criticism being hurled at the politicians who initiated the agreement. Overall, in response to a question on how to label the Israelis behind the Geneva initiative, the following emerged: naive, 15 per cent; statesmen, 23 per cent; subversive, 26 per cent; patriots, 19 per cent. The division between the negative and positive labels is identical. Among Likud voters, 16 per cent called the Israeli initiators "statesmen," while 12 per cent labelled them "patriots."

The above figures reinforce the paradox that appears in all surveys of recent years: a certain percentage of Likud voters are, in fact, leftist in their opinions. They voted for Likud for various reasons, such as a historical aversion to the Labor Party, but they would like to see a little of Beilin, or at least a little of former prime minister Shimon Peres, in Sharon.

These voters, together with a relatively large percentage of Labor and Meretz voters who see Sharon as a "fairly good" prime minister, are helping Sharon preserve his high level of support overall: 52 per cent of respondents call him "very good" or "fairly good", while 42 per cent label him "terrible" or "fairly terrible."

The survey also found that 60 per cent of Israelis support the evacuation of isolated settlements, such as Netzarim in Gaza, and that 50 per cent of Likud voters would support such a move.

Israel & the Jewish World

Two unofficial peace initiatives make the rounds

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel and the Palestinian Authority broke off substantive bilateral negotiations at Taba nearly three years ago. The talks have not been resumed due to the Palestinian uprising, the collapse of mutual trust and the hardening of mutual positions.

But in the last few months, two major unofficial efforts have been launched to breathe life into the dormant peace process.

The leaders of the first initiative, called the People's Voice, are Ami Ayalon – the former director of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service – and Sari Nusseibeh, the president of Al Quds University and the former PLO representative in Jerusalem. The second proposal, known as the Geneva Accord, is mainly the work of Yossi Beilin, Israel's former justice minister, and Yasser Abed Rabbo, the ex-PA information minister.

Similar in content, both initiatives call for a two-state solution within the framework of an end-of-conflict peace treaty, and both offer a path toward a comprehensive peace agreement.

The proposals, which have been denounced by conservatives on both sides, are the products of a curious amalgam of despair and optimism.

The Oslo peace process is dead after a succession of Palestinian attacks and Israeli counterstrikes and unilateral actions. The temporary ceasefire, which was signed by the PA and three radical Palestinian groups in June, unravelled in August following a grave upsurge of violence.

The internationally sponsored road map to peace is at a standstill after still more Palestinian suicide bombings and Israeli retaliatory raids. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, as well as U.S. President George W. Bush, continue to shun the PA president, Yasser Arafat.

Such is the situation that Israel and the PA are barely on speaking terms, though contacts were never really severed, and now Sharon hints he may take "unilateral steps" to contain the conflict. Painfully aware of the impasse that has clouded prospects for a diplomatic resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute, Israelis and Palestinians have taken matters into their own hands.

According to Nusseibeh, the peace process has been hijacked by Israeli and Palestinian extremists, and Israel and the PA are in dire need of "a helping hand."

In a recent essay, Beilin wrote, "If we, the Israelis and the Palestinians, do not try… to save ourselves, then no one else is going to do it for us. It simply cannot be that there are not enough sane people… who want to… put an end to this never-ending, horrendous cycle of violence in which we are trapped."

The "statement of principles" enunciated by Nusseibeh and Ayalon envisages a virtual Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 borders, with land swaps to accommodate blocs of Jewish settlements near the old Green Line. Sovereignty in Jerusalem would be shared, and the city would be the capital of both states. Palestinian refugees would be resettled in the new Palestinian state, not in Israel.

The Geneva Accord, which was officially signed last week in a ceremony in Switzerland, calls for mutual recognition and full diplomatic relations. Israel would be required to pull back almost to the June 4, 1967 international frontiers, and land exchanges would allow some Jewish settlements in the West Bank to remain standing.

The dispute over Jerusalem would be resolved by shared sovereignty. Although the vast majority of Arab refugees would be resettled in a Palestinian state, a token number would be allowed to return under a family reunification scheme. The Palestinians would forego future claims against Israel.

The Israeli government has not adopted a public position on the Nusseibeh-Ayalon plan, but it has categorically rejected the Geneva initiative.

Although the Palestinian Authority has officially endorsed neither the Nusseibeh-Ayalon plan nor the Geneva proposal, PA officials have described them as a basis for a deal. Palestinian radicals and Jewish settlers have vehemently attacked the plans.

Sixty-five thousand Palestinians and 113,000 Israelis have signed petitions in support of the Nusseibeh-Ayalon plan, while copies of the Geneva initiative have been mailed to Israeli and Palestinian households. According to a survey released last week, 53 per cent of Israelis and 55 per cent of Palestinians support the Geneva accord.

French lawmakers deluged by anti-Semitic e-mail

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — The French parliament's president demanded legal action last Friday after 55 lawmakers were bombarded with an anti-Semitic e-mail.

Titled "Everything you ever wanted to know about Jews but were afraid to ask," the e-mail said: "They are everywhere, they have a hold on everything."

The e-mail did not say who sent it.

National Assembly President Jean-Louis Debre asked Paris prosecutors to pursue those responsible for the "violently anti-Semitic" tract, his office said.

It refused to name the 55 lawmakers who received the e-mail.

French President Jacques Chirac promised a tough crackdown on anti-Semitism after an arson attack on a Jewish school outside Paris last month. There were no injuries, but the building was gutted.

In the last two years, France has suffered a wave of violence against Jewish schools, temples and cemeteries that coincided with new fighting in the Middle East. Many of the attacks have been blamed on young Muslims.

Hearing from a Son's Perspective

Dear Hearing Solutions,

Thank you for helping my father with his hearing. He used to be known for always adding his "two cents" to the conversation, but over the years he became more of a sitter-and-watcher. Part of me thought it was just him mellowing. So when he announced he was going to visit Hearing Solutions, I thought it was just another sign of him slowing down. Now with his new hearing aid, I've been put in my place. So has everyone else who cares to hear his opinion. His witty remarks have made a reappearance at family gatherings. Maybe it's because you need to hear the conversation to make snappy comebacks.

Thanks for helping my father hear what he's been missing.

Sincerely,
Brad Felner

Something for Every Age

Healing Body, Mind and Spirit at the Bernard Betel Centre

"People think the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living is only for 'elder' seniors," says Donna Kaplan, 62. As a member herself, she knows better. "There's something here for every age."

Members of all ages have gotten to know Donna since she joined the Betel Centre just over a year ago, when back problems took her away from teaching. "It was an effort just to get dressed," she says.

"Keyboarding" in the brand-new Computer Learning & Resource Centre

Unable to go out without a walker, she came to the Betel Centre first for programs like nutrition services and diabetes clinic. With a background in holistic and alternative medicine, she appreciated the Centre's balanced approach to wellness.

These days, she's walking on her own, but she's still coming to the Betel Centre, for benefits she hadn't even planned on. "I hadn't joined for the social aspects, but people here socialize, and it's part of healing…Everybody cares about people here."

She often takes advantage of the renovated lounge and Cafeteria. "It's a much more welcoming atmosphere to socialize; just to sit and have a coffee, and wait for class."

Donna is one of the Betel Centre's many young seniors, and is involved in almost every aspect of daily life at the Centre. Donna's talents are welcomed at weekly Musical Matinees, Diners' Club luncheons, and at Etrog Israeli Club singalongs, where she plays the piano and sings.

Most recently, she took her "keyboard connection" with the Betel Centre one step further – from the piano keyboard to the computer keyboard. After signing up for a Word Processing class in the brand-new Computer Learning and Resource Centre, she volunteered to coach beginners.

Being busy is nothing new for Donna. As a member of National Council of Jewish Women, a founding parent of Leo Baeck Day School, a teacher ("everything from kindergarten to U of T"), wellness consultant, lifelong volunteer, and most recently, a busy grandmother, Donna is clearly used to giving back.

Her contributions to the Betel Centre are appreciated both by members and by staff. "Donna's smile and positive attitude enhance our atmosphere, and her singing and piano playing bring joy to many of our members," says Esta Wall, Executive Director. "She is a great ambassador and a wonderful addition to the Centre."

Donna's approach to recovery encompasses every aspect of her life. "I need to follow a certain way of eating, thinking, living." But she says she couldn't have done it all on her own. "The Bernard Betel Centre saved my life."

A few new twists on some old favourites

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Light up your culinary interests and whet your guests' appetites this festival of lights with a few new twists on old favourites.

Chanukah wouldn't be the same without latkes, of course, but my preference is to add a few sweet potatoes to the mix, providing a hint of sweetness and colour. In addition, the sweetness of caramelized onions and the tart, ruby redness of dried cranberries enliven the salad, which is a perfect foil for the warm earthiness of the mushroom and Marsala-based brisket.

Then for a change of pace, try the Zelebi, deep fried rosette-shaped fritters, which hark back to ancient times and are a favourite in Israel and among Yemenite Jews.

TWO POTATO LATKES

5 baking potatoes (about 2½ lb.)
2 sweet potatoes (about 1½ lb.)
3 small onions, quartered
4 eggs, beaten
⅓ cup all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper

Peel baking and sweet potatoes; cut lengthwise into quarters. By hand or in food processor using the shredder blade, alternately shred the onions and potatoes. Transfer to colander, squeeze out as much moisture as possible, discarding liquid. Transfer to large bowl. Mix in eggs, flour, baking powder, salt and pepper.

In 2 skillets, heat ¼ inch oil over medium-high heat until hot but not smoking. Add ¼ cup mixture per latke, leaving space between each; flatten slightly. Cook for three minutes or until browned and crispy around the edges; turn and cook for 3 to 5 minutes longer or until crisp and golden. Transfer to paper towel-lined racks to drain well.

Repeat with remaining mixture, stirring to reblend, removing any cooked bits from the skillets and adding more oil as necessary.

(Make ahead: latkes can be covered and refrigerated for up to 8 hours. Recrisp in a 450 oven for about 5 minutes.) Makes 8 servings.

GREENS WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS, DRIED CRANBERRIES AND SUNFLOWER SEEDS

2 tbsp. butter or olive oil
2 large onions, sliced thinly
6 cups torn lettuce
⅔ cup dried cranberries (or 1 cup fresh raspberries)
¼ cup toasted sunflower seeds

Vinaigrette:
2 tbsp. maple syrup
1 tbsp. grainy dijon mustard
1 tbsp. dijon mustard
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
½ cup extra-virgin olive oil

In non-stick skillet, melt butter over medium heat. Add onions, cook, stirring, for 10 minutes. Reduce heat to medium-low; cook, stirring occasionally, for 30 to 40 minutes or until evenly golden. Let cool.

Vinaigrette: In small bowl or wet measure, whisk together maple syrup, grainy and dijon mustards, vinegar, salt and pepper. Gradually whisk in olive oil. (Vinaigrette can be refrigerated for up to 2 days. Whisk to recombine and bring to room temperature.)

In large serving bowl, combine greens, cranberries, sunflower seeds and caramelized onions. Pour half of vinaigrette over salad. Toss gently until evenly coated. Serve at room temperature. Makes 6 servings.

BRISKET WITH MUSHROOMS AND MARSALA SAUCE

2 oz. dried porcini mushrooms
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 large onions, halved and sliced
6 cloves garlic, minced
1½ tsp. dried thyme
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
1 lb. button mushrooms, trimmed and sliced
1 lb. exotic mushrooms, trimmed and sliced
4 tsp. all-purpose flour
3 cups chicken stock
1½ cups dry Marsala
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
5 lb. double or single beef brisket
pinch cayenne

Preheat oven to 325. Rinse porcini mushrooms; place in bowl. Pour ¾ cup boiling water over mushrooms; let stand at room temperature for 20 minutes. Reserving water, chop mushrooms coarsely. Set mushrooms and soaking water aside.

Meanwhile, sprinkle cayenne over fatty side of brisket. Place in large roasting pan, fatty side up; set aside.

In very large skillet or Dutch oven, heat oil over medium heat. Add onions, garlic and thyme. Cook, stirring often, for about 5 minutes or until softened. Add mushrooms, salt and pepper; cook, stirring often, for about 20 minutes or until all the liquid the mushrooms have released has evaporated and the mushrooms are starting to brown. Stir in porcini mushrooms. Sprinkle flour over. Cook, stirring, for 1 minute.

Pour in reserved soaking water, stock and Marsala; bring to a boil. Pour in balsamic vinegar. Pour over brisket in roasting pan, distributing mushrooms and onions around brisket. Cover with aluminum foil. Roast in oven for about 3 hours, basting occasionally. Let cool slightly. Cover and refrigerate for 12 to 24 hours.

Spoon fat off brisket. Remove brisket from sauce. Slice thinly across the grain. Arrange slices back in roasting pan, nestling in sauce. Cover with aluminum foil and reheat in oven at 250 for about 1 hour or until heated through. Transfer to serving platter, spooning sauce over meat slices. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

ZELEBI (FRIED ROSETTES DIPPED IN HONEY SYRUP)

Honey Syrup:
1½ cups granulated sugar
¼ cup honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
2 tsp. rose water (optional)

Batter:
2 tsp. active dry yeast (or 1 packet)
2 tsp. granulated sugar
1¾ cups warm water
2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. grated lemon rind
¼ tsp. salt
vegetable oil

Honey Syrup:

Combine 1 cup water, sugar, honey, lemon juice and rind in heavy bottomed saucepan. Bring to boil over medium-high heat, stirring only until the sugar dissolves. Reduce heat slightly; gently boil for 10 minutes, stirring in the rose water, if using, during the last few minutes of boiling. Set aside to cool completely at room temperature. (Syrup can be covered and kept at room temperature for up to 8 hours.)

In bowl, dissolve sugar in ½ cup of the warm water. Sprinkle in yeast; let stand until frothy, about 10 minutes. Add flour, lemon rind, salt and remaining warm water. Beat with an electric mixer for about 5 minutes or until very smooth, elastic and creamy. Cover bowl loosely with plastic wrap and let rise in a warm, draft-free area for 45 minutes or until spongy and frothy. Using a wooden spoon, beat dough again for 2 minutes. Let rise for 30 minutes. Stir batter vigorously to deflate any air bubbles.

In large saucepan or wok, heat about 1½ in. of vegetable oil over medium high heat, until 375. Stir to deflate the batter. Using a pastry bag, squeeze bottle or spoon, pour zig zag strip of batter into hot oil. The zelebi should have a lacy, overlapping look. How many you are able to do at once depends on the size of your saucepan. You can make more than one at a time but make sure they are not touching one another while frying. Cook, turning once, for about 4 minutes or until puffed, golden and very crisp. If the zelebi flatten out instead of puffing, your oil is not hot enough.

Using slotted spoon or fork, remove zelebi from hot oil; drain briefly on paper towel-lined rack. Then immediately immerse in cooled syrup, turning to ensure cookies are coated on all sides. Remove from syrup, letting excess syrup drip back into bowl.

Repeat with remaining batter, stirring to deflate batter in between each batch. Sprinkle lightly with icing sugar before serving. (Zelebi will stay crisp, covered with aluminum foil, for up to 8 hours.) Makes 6 to 8 servings.

'When terrorism strikes, Shaare Zedek is ready'

Hospital director explains how hospital responds to suicide bombs

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

How does a hospital respond to terror attacks when it can sometimes receive 30, 40 or up to 100 victims of a suicide bomber in one hour?

Emunah Hasin, director of external affairs of Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem, recently described the process used "during the last two years of unrelenting terror.

"When terrorism strikes, Shaare Zedek is ready," she said at a reception at the home of Karen and David Smith for supporters of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

Hasin used slides from security cameras to explain the procedures used at the hospital from just before a terrorist explosion, including the work of emergency staff and how the centre helps the families arriving to search for family members.

"Terrorists don't always do it when you are adequately staffed," she said. "So staff members must leave their positions to come to the ER room. When we are informed about large numbers of injured, we have a computerized automatic call up system."

The slides showed victims and the treatment they receive that has brought many of them back to a normal lifestyle despite major injuries.

"I try to take statistics and turn them into actual human stories," Hasin said.

"I want to raise awareness of what is really happening in Israel, not only what the media portrays. And I want to raise awareness of the role Shaare Zedek plays in the lives of the citizens of Jerusalem."

Hasin has worked as a public relations executive, nurse, policewoman, university lecturer and counsellor for cancer patients. While in Toronto, she also spoke to a meeting at the law office of Heenan Blaikie and to several groups in Ottawa, before flying to London, England.

She made aliyah from Newton, Mass., in 1977 and joined Shaare Zedek in 1979. She moved through the ranks of the nursing departments, eventually serving as director of quality assurance. She earned a master's degree in public administration of health care before joining the public relations department.

Shaare Zedek Hospital "is a key element in the emergency infrastructure of Jerusalem," Hasin said. "The hospital has cared for almost 40 per cent of those injured in major terrorist attacks."

The government has designated Shaare Zedek as the only facility on call for any suspected SARS cases in Israel, she noted.

Last year, she said, more than 56,000 patients received treatment in the ER for routine emergencies. Shaare Zedek, serving all segments of Jerusalem's population, treats almost a quarter of a million patients annually.

The hospital is a leader in cardiac care, she said, and its labour and delivery complex set a new record in October with 964 births.

"Blending state-of-the-art medical technology with deep compassion, Shaare Zedek has earned the well-deserved title of The Hospital with a Heart," despite the cutbacks, she said.

She noted that all 2,000 staff members voluntarily took a cut in salaries recently.

She paid tribute to Dr. David Applebaum, who was the head of the department of emergency medicine. He was killed in September in a terrorist attack on a café with his daughter Nava, who was to be married the next day.

Applebaum spearheaded the concept of emergency medicine as an independent specialty in which emergency medical specialists would be able to take care of most problems on their own, Hasin said.

His concept, combined with a new and larger emergency facility in a central location with a digital x-ray unit that can be read anywhere in the world, will make the hospital's ER facility No. 1 in the city, she said.

Hasin spoke of the emotional toll acts of terror have on the hospital staff as well as on the general population of Jerusalem.

"Sometimes, when I can's see any more suffering, I go up to the nursery and look at the beautiful newborns – I know that they are our future and our hope."

Books add to that Chanukah feeling

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For most of us, Chanukah is one of the best times of the year. There is terrific food to eat, like latkes and sufganiot, presents, Chanukah gelt, either money or, even better, chocolate, dreidel games and parties.

Best of all, there are the beautiful lights of the menorah that shine onto the street and make everyone feel warm and peaceful.

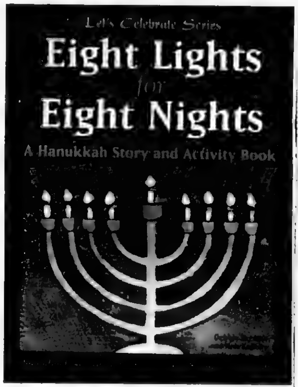
When Zev and David, two little boys from Poland, thought about Chanukah, that's how they felt too. But for them, there were no latkes, no menorah, no parties. They were in the concentration camp called Auschwitz, and they had lost their parents and their families. All they had was each other.

Their story is told in the very moving book, Menorah in the Night Sky; a miracle of Chanukah, by Jacques Shore, with illustrations by S. Kim Glassman. (Gefen Publishing House, 2002).

David was very sad. "He did not want to think of Chanukah and the happy time he cherished with his parents. It only made him sadder and made him cry."

Zev wanted desperately to be able to find a menorah, to give David hope that things would be better. But he couldn't. All he had was one candle.

He took David outside on the first night of Chanukah and held the candle up. "I will light this candle, our shamash, and let's pretend to light the menorah, as we did before with our families."



Let's Celebrate Series
Eight Lights for Eight Nights
A Hanukkah Story and Activity Book

Suddenly, as if God had heard their prayers, a star appeared. And God must have heard their prayers, because the second day, two stars appeared, and the third day three stars. Every day of Chanukah, stars appeared, just as if there was a menorah in the sky.

The miracle of the stars in the sky gave Zev and David the courage to survive their terrible time in the camp. Finally, "God, who lit the menorah in the sky, lit their way out of Auschwitz, a few months later."

The last picture in the book shows two large families celebrating Chanukah. And the elderly David and Zev are watching the stars in the sky, with their arms around each other.

Another wonderful Chanukah book is Eight Lights for Eight Nights; a Hanukkah story and activity book, by Debbie Herman and Ann Koffsky. (Barron's Educational Series, Holiday Book Series, 2003).

It tells the Chanukah story; how the Syrian Greeks tried to stop the Jews from being Jews, and how Mattathias and his five sons led a successful revolt against the enemy. When they came to rededicate the temple, they only found enough oil to last for one days, but in the well known miracle of chanukah, it lasted for eight days.

This book, though, doesn't just tell the story of Chanukah, although it does tell it very well. There are all kinds of extra bits that the authors call fun facts. For instance, did you know that there is a statue of Judah Maccabee at West Point, the academy that trains American officers? Or that in 1993, when a brick was thrown through the window of a Jewish home in a small town in Montana, thousands of non-Jews lit menorahs in their homes, as a show of support? Or that American astronaut David Wolf played dreidel in space? Because of zero gravity, the dreidl spun for an hour and a half.

The second half of the book has all kinds of activities and crafts for the holiday, complete with coloured pictures and instructions. You can learn to make a Chanukah menorah, a shamash holder, dreidels, cards, new games to play. There is even a recipe for latkes.

Both of these books give a wonderful message of hope and courage that is so much a part of Jewish history.

Miracles!

"This is the Temple we've been fighting for?"

"I don't know, Jotham...I don't remember the Temple looking like this."

Jotham and I were among the 10,000 soldiers under the command of Judah Maccabee. Only a few days before, we had forced the Greek army to retreat. The enemy gone, we were free to return to our Temple. I remembered the Temple. Before the Greeks took over, my father used to bring me there at Festival times. It was an inspiring structure, a towering hall of marble and gold rising from an enormous courtyard of stone. We had squeezed into the courtyard along with Jews from all over the world, who came to worship God, and offer their best fruits, grains, and sheep to Him in thanks. I remembered the sweet smell of incense and the soaring songs of the Levites.

It was hard to equate that with what we saw now. The walls were charred and covered with ivy, and most of the gates were burned or gone altogether. And statues! The Greeks had filled it with statues of their gods and goddesses.

KIDDISH
Jewish Kids' Fun Page
by Ellene Newman and Hallel Newman

"Shhh! Shhhh!" The men fell silent. Judah Maccabee stepped forward. His clothes were torn, in the traditional sign of mourning.

"My brothers," he began. "Although it is painful to see our Temple in ruins, we must be grateful to God that he has brought us so far, and thank him for the many miracles he has performed for us." He paused. "I would like to resume the Temple service as soon as possible. We have to remove all the statues and destroy them. The altar has been used for idolatrous sacrifices and must be replaced. The Menorah is missing. Even if we can get it back, there is no pure oil to light with. In addition, there are still some Greek soldiers nearby, whom we need to fight off. We need to work together. Please speak to me or to one of my brothers and ask what you can do."

The men surged forward, eager to help, and by the time we were able to speak to one of the generals, all he could say was, "Sorry, but all the jobs are taken already. We've already got some people making a temporary Menorah out of spears and wood, the altar's being taken care of, and so many people are getting rid of statues that you would just get in the way. If you want, though, you can look for pure oil. But I don't think you'll find any. The Greeks purposely smashed all the bottles and contaminated them. But there's nothing wrong with looking."

"So what are we going to do if we can't find any?" asked Jotham.

"We'll make some more. But that's going to take eight days. It's kind of sad though that we'll have to wait that long before we can start lighting the Menorah again."

So Jotham and I started walking around looking for oil. But of course there weren't any bottles just lying around, and it looked like most of the other men were looking too.

"Forget it," I said. If there's oil around, they would have seen it. "I'm just gonna dig. Maybe I'll find some buried underground."

"You're crazy." Replied Jotham.

"Hey," I said. "Miracles happen."

"Miracles. You know, I'm kind of annoyed about all this talk about miracles. I mean, maybe it was a miracle that we were able to defeat the Greeks. Then again, we do have the best general you ever set eyes on, and the bravest fighters you ever met in your life."

"Jotham, we just defeated 60,000 soldiers! That makes sense to you?"

"OK, OK! I'm not saying it WASN'T a miracle. It's just that there's no proof it was. Miracles don't happen all that often, you know. When was the last time you saw a sea split?"

"But they do happen sometimes!" I shot back.

"I don't know. They used to happen. I don't know if they happen anymore. I don't know if God's with us the way He used to be."

I looked up from my digging, about to respond, but Jotham was staring, riveted, at my hole. "Oil!" He gasped. I looked down. A small jug of oil lay glistening in the soft dirt.

"Don't pick it up!" yelled someone behind me. "You might accidentally contaminate it!" A throng of shouting people encircled us, parting to let though a Maccabee leader, who gingerly lifted the jug out of the hole.

"It has the seal of the High Priest on it," he whispered reverently. "It's pure. It's a miracle!"

Jotham turned to me. "There they go again. I mean, it's amazing. But who says it's a miracle?"

"Jotham, you're impossible."

* * * * * *

Still, our little jug only contained enough oil to burn for one day. And after that, it would be seven more days until we had pure oil. But tonight we celebrated. It was only late the next night that the rumors began. That the oil hadn't burned out. That it was still burning, over a day later. The next day, we asked one of the Temple priests.

"It's true," he said. "Only a little of the oil burned up. At the rate it's going, it should last until we get our fresh supply. It's a miracle."

Jotham looked down. "I guess miracles do happen," he whispered. "Even now."

A joyous cry leapt up behind us. The men were dancing in a circle, and singing songs of thanks. Jotham looked up, stared at them for a minute, wiped his eyes, and then ran with me to join the growing circle.

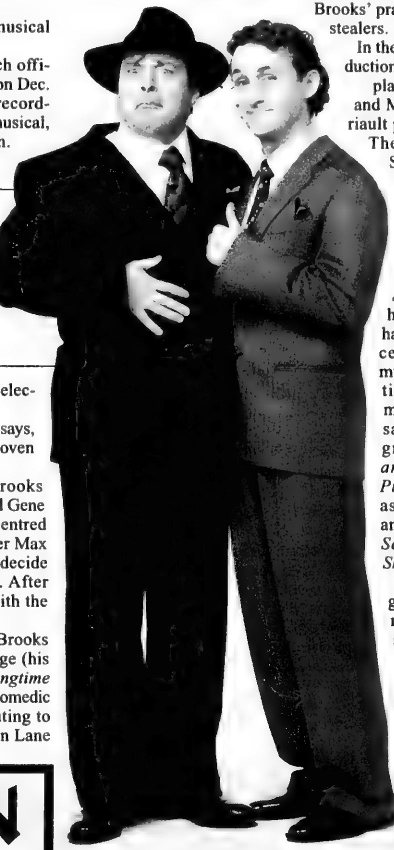
'Toronto ready for The Producers'

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

The Lion King is a cub compared to the next musical coming to Canada.

The Broadway blockbuster The Producers, which officially opens at Mirvish Productions' Canon Theatre on Dec. 11, took New York by storm in 2001, winning a record-breaking 12 Tony Awards, including ones for best musical, best direction of a musical and best scenic design. Critics inked endless praise: The New York Observer hailed it as "the best show ever," The Daily News implored Mel Brooks to run for mayor and Ben Brantley of the New York Times wrote, "[The Producers] operates on a self-perpetuating, can-you-top-this energy, generating enough electricity to light up California for the next century."



Sean Cullen as Max Bialystock and Michael Therriault as Leo Bloom in the Toronto production of The Producers , the new Mel Brooks musical.

David Mirvish, producer of Mirvish Productions, says, "It won the most Tony Awards in history, so it's proven itself. I think Toronto is ready for this."

The buzz began decades earlier, when Mel Brooks released the movie in 1968. Starring Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder as two money-hungry producers, the film centred on a deliciously satirical plot: Broadway flop master Max Bialystock and mousy accountant Leopold Bloom decide to raise $2 million for a show guaranteed to fail. After fleecing investors, they plan to escape to Brazil with the cash and the last laugh.

The Broadway version kept the basic story, but Brooks jazzed it up and wrote music and lyrics for the stage (his first musical foray). The show-within-a-show, Springtime for Hitler, is known as the theatrical centrepiece, and comedic jabs complement the cheeky production. Contributing to the Broadway show's depth were lead actors Nathan Lane as Bialystock and Matthew Broderick as Bloom, both breaking out of Hollywood routine to perfect Brooks' prancing scene-stealers.

In the Toronto production, Sean Cullen plays Bialystock and Michael Therriault plays Bloom. Therriault is a Stratford regular who has also acted in Billy Bishop Goes to War and West Side Story. Cullen has star power, having cemented his musical reputation as a member of the satirical rock group Corky and the Juice Pigs, and later as a comedian and star of The Sean Cullen Show on CBC.

"This is a great stretch for me," Cullen says between rehearsals. "It's been a vocal marathon but I love the stage and I'm a huge fan of the movie."

But won't admirers of the New York production instinctively compare him to Lane?

"I bring something different to the role," Cullen says simply.

Mirvish views the situation with greater optimism.

"It's nice for Lane and Broderick to set the bar high, especially when your team can jump over that bar."

Mirvish shifts metaphors and refers to the Therriault-Cullen duo as a thrilling tennis match "where you need someone skilled to hit the ball back to you."

Fans of Brooks musicals can expect patches of his patented politically incorrect humour. Song lyrics poke fun at Germans, Jews, Swedes, homosexuals, Irish policemen and theatre insiders. Even heavyweights like Mirvish are set in comedic crosshairs – at one point, Bloom sings, "I wanna be a producer, and sleep until half-past two/ I wanna be a producer, and say, 'You. You. You. Not you.'"

Hitting too close to home, perhaps?

"Well, I can't say I'm like Max Bialystock," Mirvish says, laughing. "He raised the money by himself, but there are dozens of backers for The Producers."

The Producers runs from Dec. 11 through to April 25, 2004 at the Canon Theatre, 244 Victoria St. Ticket prices range from $31 to $121 and can be purchased by calling 1-800-461-3333.

NABUCCO: Royal Opera Canada's full-staged production of Verdi's grand opera Nabucco continues this week at the Toronto Centre of the Arts. The opera, which focuses on the conquest of the ancient Hebrews and their exile in Babylon, became immensely popular after its premiere at La Scala in 1842 because the Hebrew captives' prayers for deliverance were seen as a comment on Italy's political subjugation to Austria. Banned in the former Soviet Union because of its sympathetic portrayal of Jewish suffering, the opera has been performed numerous times in Hebrew translation in Israel; this is its premiere production in Toronto. Nabucco is the Italian name for Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldean ruler who destroyed the First Temple and sent the Jews into exile. The final two performances are on December 4 and 6. Box office, 416-872-1111.

Lenka takes her listeners 'to unique place'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Czech-born singer and songwriter, Lenka Lichtenberg says her upcoming concert, "Open the Gate," is a fitting testament to Canada's cultural diversity.

Her CD of the same name will be released at the concert on Dec. 7 at 7:30 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W.

"All the main participants on this recording project and concert are longtime collaborators who stem from different cultural backgrounds."

The result, she says, "takes the listener to a unique, attractive place all its own."

Lichtenberg's second CD features new, original songs in English, with music ranging from Middle Eastern to eastern European.

Both the concert and the 12 original songs on the CD combine Lichtenberg's passionate singing with the instrumental virtuosity of eight of Toronto's leading musicians. Master string player Levon Ichkhanian, who produced the CD, will also be performing.

Lichtenberg's first CD, Deep Inside, is a collection of five Yiddish songs, one Ladino/Hebrew song and six of her original compositions in English.

Born and raised in Prague where she was a child star, Lichtenberg came to Canada in 1981. She currently teaches music at Ryerson University.

Lichtenberg has performed in Toronto at the Ashkenaz Festival and with Zalmen Mlotek at the Yiddish Festival in Queens, N.Y.. She has presented several solo performances in Prague. She received the Canada Council of the Arts Specialized Recording Grant in the category of world music.

During Holocaust Remembrance Week, Lichtenberg performed as a soloist with Mitch Smolkin, as well as with the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir and the JCC Choir, at a program at the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre. She also sang Yiddish songs written by Simcha Simchovitch and Gurion Hyman.

In addition, Lichtenberg performs cantorial music. She has sung Kol Nidre at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and for several years, she has chanted selected High Holy Day prayers at Darchei Noam Reconstructionist Synagogue, where she is a member.

"Being welcomed to daven at Darchei Noam for Shabbat services is very meaningful and a very warm experience for me and my family," she says.

Tickets for the Dec. 7 concert are $15. For more information, visit www.lenkalichtenberg.com or for tickets, call Ticketmaster, 416-872 1111 or 416-932 0550.

Norman Jewison movie delves into France's wartime fascist past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Caine in a scene from The Statement

Norman Jewison's competently crafted film, The Statement, revisits France's flirtation with fascism and its complicity in the wanton deaths of 77,000 Jews.

Scheduled to open in Toronto on Dec. 12, The Statement, starring Michael Caine as a war criminal on the run, is a political thriller with a tough message.

France, it is true, was occupied by Nazi Germany. But it is equally true that Vichy France – the French puppet state tolerated by the Nazis – shamelessly promulgated a whole series of anti-Semitic edicts, and that the French police, the Milice, zealously rounded up, and even killed, Jews.

Shot on location in France, The Statement focuses on the role of one of its members in these gruesome events. Adapted by the talented Ronald Harwood from a novel by Brian Moore, the film opens in June 1944.

The Nazis, with the help of the Milice, have rousted a group of Jews from their homes, and seven are immediately marked for death. In a stark scene, Pierre Brossard, the local Milice chief, takes part in their execution.

Fast forward to a southern French city in 1992. An assassin, carrying a Canadian passport, tries to kill the 70-year-old Brossard (Caine). He has been sheltered all these years by old Milice colleagues, certain influential politicians and reactionary elements within the Catholic church.

The Statement then shifts to Paris. Brossard has belatedly been charged with crimes against humanity. Annemarie Livi (Tilda Swinton), a half-Jewish judge, and Col. Roux (Jeremy Notham), a policeman, have been assigned to his case.

Livi, who considers Brossard nothing less than a murderer, is eager to get on with the investigation and establish who granted Brossard a pardon."Unless the whole truth is brought into the open," she says, "the dead will never rest easily."

As Livi and Roux assemble a dossier on his dubious career, Brossard takes steps to fend off his pursuers. A pious Christian, he turns for help to sympathizers in the former Milice and in the church. One of his champions in the clergy, Monsignor LeMoyne, believes that Brossard "acted in good faith."

He asserts that Brossard's role in the execution of seven Jews remains unproven. He contends that Brossard was only "following orders" when he requisitioned Jewish property during the war. He claims that the French resistance was communist in spirit and intended to "deliver" France to Joseph Stalin.

It's clear that Brossard has friends in high places. Livi learns this on a first-hand basis when a French government cabinet minister, who happens to be Livi's uncle, advises her to withdraw from the case. "You will be destroyed mercilessly," he warns.

The movie builds to a climax when a second assassin attempts to eliminate Brossard, and when a public relations-minded cardinal in the church declares Brosssard a persona non grata.

As Brossard, Caine is a wonder to behold, the reincarnation of a brutal cynic who will go to any length to elude justice. Caine, a natural actor, slips effortlessly into Brossard's skin.

Swinton, however, is too self-conscious as a crusading judge, and really too quintessentially British to be portraying a French person.

The mild-mannered Northam seems somewhat out of his depth as a supposedly hard-driving policeman. But Charlotte Rampling, who plays Brossard's estranged wife, is perfect in her cameo appearance as a woman scorned.

As director, Jewison usually has matters well in hand, but occasionally, he falls short of sustaining the tension that is so central to The Statement.

Harwood's screenplay, while not in the same league as his award-winning script for The Pianist, treats the topic with the respect and gravity it deserves.

Let it be said that The Statement, which deals with one of the gravest breaches of human rights in the annals of history, is admirably faithful to its subject.

New York-based Israeli band makes Canadian debut

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Winter may be descending on us, but the Seeds of Sun are bringing warmth and sunshine with them to an upcoming family Chanukah celebration at Toronto's Leah Posluns Theatre.

Seeds of Sun, who are performing at Leah Posluns on Dec. 11, are a group of jazz musicians from Israel living in Brooklyn, New York.

The group – vocalist Michal Cohen, flautist Mattan Klein, pianist Yoav Polachek, bassist Itamar Ziegler and drummer Yuval Lion – met while studying at the Berklee College of Music in Boston on scholarship.

Now in their late 20s to their mid-30s, each of them had established careers in Israel before leaving for the United States, but they chose to remain in New York after completing their studies at Berklee.

"New York has this magnetic attraction," says Klein. "Everyone ends up in New York trying to make their musical dreams come true."

Seeds of Sun recorded a self-titled CD in July 2002, and the band made its concert debut late last year. Since then, the group has played its brand of contemporary Israeli music to large, enthusiastic audiences throughout the eastern United States.

The band's repertoire, which is mostly in Hebrew, springs from their love of music and of Israel, Klein says.

Contemporary Israeli music is a mixed bag, he says. For Seeds of Sun, that means playing pieces from a variety of genres, including traditional Israeli and Jewish music, klezmer, jazz and funk.

The members of Seeds of Sun play separately in other bands as well. Klein plays in a jazz band, Ziegler plays in a hip hop group, Polachek is active in the New York jazz scene and drummer Lion is one of the busiest players in the city's rock-funk scene. Cohen, who has won the Cleo Laine vocal jazz award, has sung on stages throughout the United States and is the leader of a Yemenite ensemble.

At the Dec. 11 performance, Seeds of Sun will perform an eclectic program, including such Israeli favourites as Yedid Nefesh (Soul Friend) and a jazzy interpretation of the prayer Oseh Shalom (He Who Brings Peace), along with other tunes from their CD, which is made up of the band's jazz-flavoured interpretations of traditional Jewish and Israeli music, modern Israeli tunes and original material.

The CD contains energetic playing and lovely melodies. Cohen's vocals are sparkling. Klein's flute on the seven tracks of the recording is reminiscent of the easy-to-listen-to, ethereal sound of the late Canadian flautist Moe Koffman. He also wrote Laximum, a song that is both a tribute to Jerusalem, where he grew up, and the story of how a friend got his nickname (from his dog, Laxi).

Klein grew up in a musical household. His mother taught music and he started out playing piano at the age of seven, then he moved on to the recorder at nine. His late father, professor Michael Klein, the former dean of Jerusalem's Hebrew Union College, gave him his first flute at age 10. Klein has played in the Jerusalem Youth Orchestra and toured Europe with the Horah Jerusalem Folklore Group.

Until recently, Klein taught Hebrew – "like a lot of Israelis in New York," he says – and one day he came across the world "seeds," which became the inspiration for the band's name.

The seeds have proved to be fertile. After a little more than a year of public appearances, the band's popularity is growing steadily, with a possible tour to the Far East and Europe in the future.

Klein says the upcoming concert at Leah Posluns will be high energy.

"This is the right time to bring Israel to communities across North America," he says. "We carry the torch of Israeli awareness and support without going into any politics."

For tickets, call the ticket hotline at 416-636-1880, ext. 228. General admission: $30; group rate, $25; seniors and children under 14, $15.

To get the band's CD, visit their Web site at www.seedsofsun.com.

Bessarabian clarinetist keeps Soviet klezmer alive

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

No Jewish cultural tradition survived decades of supression in the former Soviet Union more vibrantly or persistently than klezmer music.

This was made evident at a closing klezmer concert called "Klezmer Behind the Iron Curtain" at the recent Russian culture weekend event "Soviet and Kosher."

The show provided a rare opportunity for Torontonians to hear a true living treasure of Jewish music, German Goldenshteyn.

The Bessarabian-born, New York-based clarinetist led an ad hoc ensemble called the Red Army Klezmer Band, featuring Moldavian accordionist Iosef Kagansky (now based in Burlington), and New York-based klezmorim Michael Alpert (violin, accordion, poyk) and Jeff Wollock (violin).

The group performed selections drawn mostly from Goldenshteyn's unique repertoire, which was acquired over decades of playing in Soviet klezmer bands at both Jewish and non-Jewish weddings in Bessarabia.

The musicians seemed somewhat underrehearsed, and at times unsure of themselves, but what lacked in polish was made up for by the music's historical and cultural significance and by the performers' infectious energy. This was real down home klezmer music as it might have been heard at Bessarabian simchahs in past decades.

Somehow the plush Isabel Bader Theatre, filled with an appreciative yet restrained audience, seemed an inappropriate setting for the show. Goldenshteyn's music is more for dancing and merriment than for the stage and is best appreciated in less formal surroundings.

Today in the former Soviet Union, there is a growing tide of interest in aspects of Jewish culture, especially Yiddish language and music. Festivals of Jewish culture and klezmer music have sprung up in such unlikely locales as St. Petersburg and Kiev. The steady tide of Jewish emigration from the former Soviet regions to North America has brought many Jews whose stories reveal just how tenacious Jewish cultural traditions remained throughout the Soviet period.

Born in Romania in 1934 and orphaned during the Holocaust, Goldenshteyn studied music in a Soviet military academy and served as a musician in the Red Army from 1949 to 1956.

Returning to civilian life in Ukraine, he worked as an engineer in a metalworks factory, but continued playing music part-time for decades, maintaining the centuries-old tradition of eastern European klezmer music during a period when it was largely thought to have disappeared.

What makes Goldenshteyn exceptional, aside from his still-impressive chops on the clarinet, is that when he emigrated to the United States in 1994, he brought with him more than 800 tunes carefully notated on tiny scraps of paper. This vast repertoire, along with his recollections of life as a Soviet Jewish musician, reveal just how vibrant klezmer remained during the dark decades of the Soviet era.

Goldenshteyn's brand of klezmer bears the multicultural characteristics of the border region in which he lived and performed in for so many decades. While much of his repertoire can be considered purely Jewish, a great deal of it includes Russian, Ukrainian and especially Moldavian/Romanian influences. His cross-cultural fluency makes him especially valuable as a resource to today's klezmer musicians and scholars. This kind of hybridization is in many ways the essence of klezmer music.

Since his arrival on these shores, Goldenshteyn has become something of a cause célebr within the North American klezmer musi scene, a primary resource of an entire milie of Jewish music about which too little had bee known.

Goldenshteyn has published three volume of his musical transcriptions and continues t publish a new volume each year. As a faculty instructor at Yiddish culture festivals such a KlezKanada, he's had the opportunity to wor with young North American klezmer musicians passing on to them his tunes and stories, an giving his style of music new life in the ongoin klezmer revival.

There are plans for a Goldenshteyn CD, an hopefully the wait won't be long. Goldenshteyn music carries tremendous value, and the mor it is highlighted, the more the klezmer tradition many facets will be understood and apprecia ed.

Business Profile

Accountant Leon Goren takes justwhiteshirts to new heights

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leon Goren hopes the trend toward casual dressing in corporate North America has reached its apogee, and that a return to "business formal" attire is not too far around the corner.

He promotes the concept of men's formal wear in the workplace because, after all, it is in his interest.

Goren is president, chief executive officer and a founder of justwhiteshirts.com, a Toronto-based company whose dress shirts and other products are sold through catalogues and the Internet.

As its moniker implies, justwhiteshirts is big on dress shirts.

The company's perennial bestseller, the Supreme, an Oxford-style button-down shirt woven from the finest cotton, is available in four shades: white, pink, blue and green. Company presidents, as well as up-and-coming executives, are partial to the Supreme, Goren said.

But if the Supreme does not meet their requirements, they may opt for the British Collection, whose shirts are made of 100/2-ply Egyptian cotton.

If the British Collection is unsuitable, there is always the Italian Collection, whose shirts emphasize clear lines and striking colour definitions.

Alternatively, buyers may prefer a shirt from The Chairman's Choice. These feature single-needle stitching, dressy hand-rolled French seams, a four-piece split yoke for an excellent fit across the shoulder, extra-long button and sleeve plackets, pleats and longer shirt tails.

And if a buyer likes honeycomb fabrics, he can select a shirt from the Oxford Collection.

Goren, 38, who founded justwhiteshirts with two friends nine years ago, holds forth on the subject of shirts with the greatest of ease and expertise, much as a seasoned historian can regale a class with tales of the Punic Wars or the Six Day War.

For Goren, a shirt is not just a shirt.

"It starts with the fabric," he said the other afternoon, leaning forward on his chair to drive home the point.

Justwhiteshirts, which buys many of its fabrics from Britain, India and Japan, uses two-ply cotton, which is especially durable.

As he continued his impromptu lecture, he explained that the finish of a shirt is of crucial importance, as is the quality of its buttons and the linings in the collars.

And the stitching must be just so, said Goren, who always wears his company's shirts.

"There is a lot of detail that goes into a great quality shirt."

Lasting an average of 65 to 100 launderings or washings, his shirts are manufactured mainly in Hong Kong, Pakistan and Canada. Manufacturing costs are about one-third lower abroad.

Cotton is the fabric of choice when it comes to shirts, he noted.

"Cotton is the best breathing shirt around. Polyester can't breathe. It's one of the first indications of a cheap shirt."

And Goren takes satisfaction from the fact that the price of his shirts does not induce sticker shock. A comparison of highbrow brands bears him out. A Brioni shirt retails for $375, while a Burberry shirt sells for $235. Goren's shirts range from $65 to $75.

Is he cutting corners?

The simple answer is no. Goren reduces costs by letting customers buy directly from justwhiteshirts' catalogue or its Web site, and then he passes on the savings.

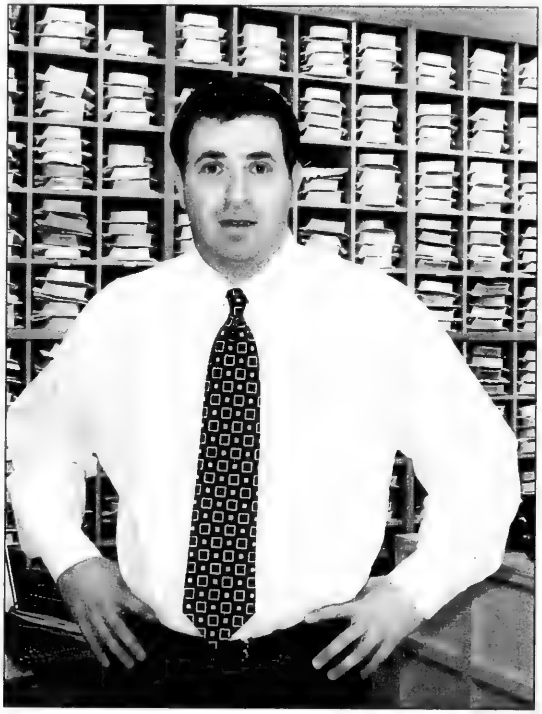
Another reason his shirts are better priced is that Goren owns his own retail outlets – one at First Canadian Place, at King and Bay streets, and another on Leslie Street, in the suburbs.

Although men's dress shirts are the mainstay of his business, justwhiteshirts sells upwards of 200 other kinds of goods, from cufflinks, socks and belts to golf shirts and chinos.

Of late, Goren has segued into women's wear, mainly polo shirts and cotton twill shirts, which comprise about 10 per cent of sales. "We're hoping to grow this part of the business," he said. "But it takes time."

Goren's expansion plans also envisage 10 more stores in the next few years.

As more shops are opened, catalogue and Internet sales will inevitably fall. Currently, they generate just over 40 per cent of total sales.



Leon Goren

But, as he acknowledged, some Canadian consumers prefer to buy in a store because they can touch and feel the fabrics.

"It's a very tough business to be in. Canadians, typically, don't like to buy from catalogues and the Internet."

Yet catalogue sales are what make justwhiteshirts virtually unique in Canada, Goren claimed. "We're one of the only cataloguers in the country."

And justwhiteshirts is one of the relatively few dot.com companies that weathered the recent recession.

"Sales were flat after Sept. 11," Goren said. "Men put their disposable incomes on hold."

But lately, the economy has recovered from its slump.

Goren, who was born and raised in Montreal and settled in Toronto in 1976, began his career as an accountant.

He studied economics at the University of Western Ontario and took a chartered accountancy course at the University of Toronto.

Before going into business for himself, he worked in Toronto, Boston and Vancouver.

He founded justwhiteshirts in 1994 with two partners, Doug Childerhose and Keith Beckley. Today, Childerhose is in charge of sales and development, while Goren is responsible for overseas operations. Beckley, though no longer active, sits on the board.

Originally called Just White Shirts & Black Socks, Inc., the company changed its name three years ago as a marketing ploy to accentuate its best-selling product, men's shirts.

The threesome started the company with $25,000 of their own funds, and then investors came on board with extra financing.

For the first four years, Goren kept his day job, not entirely certain whether the company would survive. But once sales took off and he was reasonably sure the company could provide him with a comfortable income, Goren – the father of three young children – began working on a full-time basis for justwhiteshirts.

Goren, whose wife Michele is a portfolio manager, likes fine clothes. "It's critical to dress well. That's very important to me."

But he is hardly a clothes horse, and at home, he favours the "relaxed look" of shorts and T-shirts.

So much for the formal look.

Memorial service honours pioneers of Israeli winter sports

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian visitors joined residents of northern Israel to pay tribute to two proponents of winter sports who died within months of each other.

Former Metulla mayor Yossi Goldberg and NHL coach Roger Neilson were remembered last week in a ceremony that celebrated their contributions to Canada Centre, the recreational complex built in Metulla with the help of Canadian Jews.

Goldberg was remembered as the visionary leader who worked to make Metulla a must-see destination for Israelis and tourists alike. The Canada Centre was constructed during his administration and provided residents of Israel's far north with a multi-use sports and recreational facility.

It's also home to the country's only Olympic-sized ice surface, which has become the home rink for Israel's hockey, figure skating and short-track speed skating programs.

In his later years, Goldberg devoted himself to the country's figure skating program, as head of the Association for Winter Sports in Israel.

Neilson, who served as head coach for the Toronto Maple Leafs and as an assistant in Vancouver, Philadelphia and Ottawa among many NHL stops, ran his summer hockey camp in Metulla for four seasons. Dozens of Israeli skaters laced up with visiting Canadians and Americans at the camp. A handful of Israeli players also travelled to Lindsay, Ont., to participate in Neilson's hockey school.

"Yossi Goldberg was an absolute dynamo," recalled Gerry Halbert, former head of UIA Canada and a personal friend of the late mayor.

"He never took 'no' for an answer. He wanted to make winter sport succeed and develop world class athletes," Halbert said.

Shmuel Ben-Shachar, general manager of Canada Centre, said Goldberg was like a prophet who was not completely appreciated in his own time. But thanks to his initiative, more than 150 athletes train regularly at Canada Centre and between 115,000 and 120,000 visitors make use of the centre's facilities each year. The Canada Centre is only one of four facilities in Israel to have received a national centre designation.

Jeff Budd, who volunteered at Canada Centre's hockey program, said Neilson was unfazed by the dangers of holding a hockey camp within metres of the Lebanese border.

On one occasion, Neilson arrived to find incoming katyusha rockets had forced the hockey players into a bomb shelter. Neilson immediately improvised a ping pong tournament. "The kids loved him," Budd said.

Jeff Budd and Yossi Goldberg's widow, Galia, stand in front of a monument to the late mayor.

Many alumni of Neilson's hockey school were among the 150 participants at the memorial ceremony, which included inauguration of the Yossi Goldberg School of Excellence, a program for developing top skating athletes.

Budd said a plaque at the entrance to Canada Centre in Neilson's honour recalls the coach as "a leader, innovator, inspired teacher" and as "a true friend to Israel, forever in our minds and in our hearts."

Although the centre is popular in the region, it has suffered financially in the last three years, Ben-Shachar said.

"The economy has been bad, tourism is lousy and the border is noisy. All the facts are bad."

An Israeli government subsidy has been slashed from 1.2 million shekels three years ago to 500,000 shekels (around $147,000) today.

The number of domestic visitors has dropped, as many Israelis take advantage of cheap vacation packages in Turkey and Greece.

When it comes to its finances, "Canada Centre always walks on the edge," and scraping together enough money to pay bills is always problematic, Ben-Shachar said. But, he added, "we always find a way not to close."

If the political situation settles down and the visitor number increases to 150,000 per year, the centre can get by without outside assistance. he added.

Pan Am Maccabi Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Eighty-five Canadian athletes and coaches will join 2,500 Jewish sportsmen and women from around the world at the Pan Am Maccabi Games in Santiago, Chile, from Dec. 28 to Jan. 4.

Canada will field four basketball teams, as well as teams in men's softball, mini-football (soccer), 10-pin bowling, golf and beach volleyball. Individual athletes in tennis (masters division), squash and the half-marathon will also be going.

Basketball proved the most popular of the sports in Canada, as coaches had to cut a number of players before settling on 10 to 11 players for each of the squads. Canada will send a junior boys team (kids born from 1987-89), a youth squad (boys born from 1984-86), an open men's team (no age limitation), as well as an open women's team.

Although most athletes hail from in and around Toronto, about 10 are from Montreal and a smaller number come from Winnipeg, Vancouver, Calgary and Halifax, said Allen Gerskup, head of the Canadian delegation.

Originally, the Confederation of Latin American Maccabis had hoped to hold the Games in Venezuela, but the volatile political situation in that Latin American country forced a change of plans, and Santiago was chosen as the organizers' fallback position.

Although Santiago is home to only about 15,000 Jews, Gerskup believes the community is well organized and affluent enough to pull off a first class event. The Maccabi movement has a very high profile in the Chilean Jewish community and the community has put together a program that includes social and cultural events, Shabbat celebrations and plenty of parties, he said.

While sports is the centrepiece of the Pan Am get together, the event also affords the opportunity "for a show of solidarity with Jewish people in South America," Gerskup said.

The Games will include Western Hemisphere nations like the United States, Mexico, Chile, Brazil and Argentina, as well as athletes from Australia, Israel, Switzerland and South Africa.

Continue on Jewish journey!

(Bids adieu to readers)

something

By JODI KOVITZ

After completing my undergraduate studies, I started exploring who I was as an adult. Naturally, being Jewish, part of that inquiry involved examining how religion and spirituality fit into my life. I asked myself such questions as, "Who am I as a Jew? Why do or why do I not engage in Jewish ritual? Do I want more spirituality or guidance in my life? If so, how do I get it?"

I will never forget the first time that I became aware of how important my Judaism is to me. As I pointed out in my first column, this realization came to me while I was living in Milan, surrounded by Roman Catholics, far from my cozy Jewish community. It was very difficult to find a seder there for Passover. After scouring the Web, I ended up in a seniors' home, singing the four questions in Italian. What's funny is that the awakening of my Jewish identity happened when I was so far away from everything I thought defined me as a Jew: family, friends, community and familiar rituals.

When I returned from Italy, I continued to explore how Judaism could fit into my life. I took a course at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Education by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein called "Judaism and the Quest for Spirituality." We discussed traditional and modern rituals, sex, money, relationships and community.

I realized, in that class, that I was not alone in my quest. My peers and I shared a desire to make sense of Jewish law, tradition and culture from adult perspectives and make our own Jewish choices accordingly. Our shared questions and stimulating dialogue inspired me to write about my experiences.

From Starbucks to synagogue, we search. What do we face, being Jewish and 20-something? How do we deal with the expectations that have been placed on us by our parents, our peers and our communities? What does the word God mean to us? How does Israel fit into our lives?

I have learned a tremendous amount through asking these questions and through exploring the perspectives that you have shared with me. I now realize that Judaism can play an extremely fulfilling role in our lives if we choose to act Jewishly and appreciate what our rituals, tradition and teachings have to offer. I know that when I make time in my daily grind for the important things – friends, family, community, spirituality and ritual – I feel whole. I have come to see my Judaism not as a chore, but a privilege. I am beginning to carve out my own Jewish identity and decide on a level of affiliation that is comfortable to me but through which I can begin to commit myself to the principles of Jewish law and to Jewish values. Thank you for your interest in reading my reflections and for your participation in my journey. I encourage you to continue on your own and wish you the best of luck.

Southwestern Style Potato Latkes

1-1/2 lbs. russet potatoes, peeled
2 large eggs, lightly beaten
2 tblsps. flour
2 tblsps. chopped oregano
1 1/2 tsps. salt
freshly ground black pepper
vegetable oil for frying
roasted red peppers and salsa for garnish

In food processor grate potatoes. Set a sieve over a bowl. Let mixture drain for 15 minutes. After 15 minutes, pour off liquid from the bowl but leave the white potato starch that setttles in the bottom of the bowl.

To that starch add eggs, flour, herbs, salt and pepper. Return drained potatoes to this mixture and toss to combine.

Line baking pan with paper towels. In a large skillet heat 1/4" oil over medium high heat until hot. Drop heaping tablespoonfuls of potato mixture and cook for 3-4 minutes each side; latkes should be golden and crisp on both sides. Eat right away or keep warm in oven.

Serve topped with slivers of roasted red peppers, and salsa.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

I recently returned from the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities and North American Jewish Federations (GA) in Jerusalem, where Canadians made a wonderful showing.

I had two tasks at the event: to expose Toronto lay leaders to recent innovations in Israeli education and to conduct interviews with Israeli educators who are candidates for shlichut in Toronto.

Both of my missions revealed a side of Israel that gives one hope in these difficult times. Over the past few decades, Israelis have noticed that the study of Jewish sources in the non-religious sectors of society has deteriorated severely. There was a time when all Israelis knew a great deal of the Hebrew Bible, even if rabbinic literature was less studied.

The new reality was described a few years ago by an aging representative of the secular, socialist Zionists: "We wanted to raise a generation of epikorsim [heretics], but instead raised a generation of am haratzim [ignorant Jews]!"

There are also many voices within the religious community who tell of widespread indifference to Jewish study.

While the response is still limited, several established organizations are working hard to change this sad trend. They are mixed voices that transcend politics, denominations, Ashkenazi-Sephardi differences and religious-secular divides. All of them are attempting to revive a love affair between the people of Israel and its literary heritage. These special souls believe that the Bible, its commentaries, the Talmud, our liturgy, our flowing poetry and our dry legal prose are all a treasure-house of values-laden gems that belong to every Jew. Those of us who have not studied these texts have been grossly cheated.

It was my pleasure to introduce some Toronto Jews who share these concerns to Israelis who are making history by creating new modes of study and comfort zones for Israelis who have indeed been cheated out of their heritage. It was also my great joy to meet impressive Israelis of different generations who wish to translate their passion for Jewish study in Israel to our needs in Canada. Once again, I was confronted with living proof that ki mitzion teitzei Torah.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Reflections on an outgoing PM

By RON CSILLAG

Analysis

Exit the Little Guy from Shawinigan after 10 sometimes tumultuous, sometimes infuriating, but hardly ever dull years from the prime minister's chair.

And as we are wont to say during times of transition: was he good for the Jews?

Jean Chrétien was often a lightning rod for the Jewish community's anger over a number of issues – Canada's voting pattern on anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations chief among them – but the real story is too complicated and nuanced to assign the retiring prime minister an overall grade.

History's long view may show that while Chrétien undoubtedly aroused many passions among Canadian Jews at particularly volatile times, his relations and accomplishments with the community and Israel were not as bad as many have made them out to be, nor as good as they could have been.

Chrétien may have come across as sometimes insensitive and inarticulate, but even his detractors concede he was a consummate politician, a shrewd cultivator of relations and an empathetic ear. As a one-time unilingual francophone, he used to point out, he'd known his own share of bigotry.

Rabbi Plaut retires his CJN pen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For more than 20 years, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, 91, received inspiration for his weekly column in The Canadian Jewish News from the people he met and the places he visited.

"Writing always came easy to me. Someone would speak to me about a certain issue, and before I knew it, it became the stuff of a column," says Rabbi Plaut, senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple, author of 23 books, including a two-volume autobiography, and a companion of the Order of Canada.

"I wrote a lot of good articles, and perhaps even a lot of nonsense, but I always felt I was reaching the readers," Rabbi Plaut said in an interview.

Gunther Plaut

"Now that I am in my 90s, however, it is not always possible to come up with a topic. My world is shrinking somewhat. The inspiration is not always there. Before, the subject would come to me; now I have to look for subjects. Before, I was a participant; now I am a bystander."

But he said he plans to continue writing "when the urge strikes me and I have something to say. To me, writing is like talking to people and that is very important.

"People used to come to see me at the temple just to talk. Sometimes talking is part of the healing."

Flood Rescue

JERUSALEM — A bus with 50 schoolgirls from Jerusalem was swept away last Tuesday near the Tze'elim river, close to Ein Gedi, after heavy rains spread to the south of the country. Rescue workers, aided by Israel Defence Forces helicopters, safely evacuated all the passengers of the bus, which was swept away after the driver lost control of the vehicle.

Dead Sea Marketing

EILAT — Israel and Jordan unveiled a plan last month to lure back international tourists after three years of Palestinian violence by jointly marketing their respective Red Sea port resorts of Eilat and Aqaba. Israeli Tourism Minister and Aqaba governor Akel Biltaji said tourism can help promote peace between the two countries, and Biltaji sought Elon's assistance to promote an international airport in Aqaba.

Screening Jenin, Jenin

JERUSALEM — The controversial film Jenin, Jenin, about Israel's April 2002 invasion of the Jenin refugee camp, is set to be screened in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. The screenings come after Israel's Supreme Court recently agreed with director Mohammed Bakri's appeal that a ban on the documentary-style film violated free-speech legislation. New appeals against the film are being made. A UN probe determined no massacre took place in Jenin and found no evidence to support charges in Bakri's film.

WORLD

Chabad in 70 Nations

NEW YORK — Chabad-Lubavitch announced last month it has emissaries in more than 70 countries, a record for the movement. New countries that added full-time emissaries this year include Cyprus, Croatia, Finland and India. The announcement was made at Chabad's 20th annual Shluchim convention, which drew about 2,000 Jewish outreach emissaries, or shluchim, to a five-day conference in Brooklyn.

Editor Arrested

NEW YORK — The press freedom group Reporters Without Borders is protesting the arrest of a Bangladeshi editor on charges of spying for Israel. The group said it's dismayed at the arrest of Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudury as he was set to leave the South Asian Muslim country for Israel on Nov. 29. Choudury was to give a speech in Tel Aviv to a writers group on the role of the media in Muslim-Jewish dialogue. Bangladesh and Israel do not have diplomatic relations.

Centre Presses Pope

ROME — The Simon Wiesenthal Center wants Pope John Paul II to declare suicide bombing a crime against humanity. A senior delegation from the centre, which is launching an international campaign against bombings, made its appeal in a private Vatican audience with the Pope last week. He did not respond publicly. The delegation also bestowed the centre's 2003 humanitarian award on the Pope in recognition of his friendship with the Jewish people.

Film to Open in NYC

NEW YORK — A comedy about a Jewish super-hero who tries to save Chanukah will be released Dec. 19 in New York. Modelled after the "blaxploitation" films of the 1970s, The Hebrew Hammer stars Adam Goldberg, who played Pvt. Mellish in Saving Private Ryan.

Jewish Student Beaten

PARIS — Muslim students allegedly beat up a Jewish student at a prestigious school in Paris. According to media reports, Muslims yelled, "We'll finish Hitler's job!" as they repeatedly beat the boy, aged 11. The headmaster of the Lycée Montaigne has vowed to address the matter. The boy has been transferred to another class.

Deadlines for Survivor Claims Approaching

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is advising Holocaust survivors and victims' heirs to note two deadlines.

Holocaust survivors or heirs of victims may have legitimate unpaid Holocaust era insurance claims that can be filed through a free process set up by the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC). Anyone who believes they have a valid life, education or dowry policy is encouraged to make a claim to the ICHEIC before Dec. 31. For details, visit www.icheic.org.

The Austrian Reconciliation Fund, established to compensate former slave and forced labourers under the Nazis within the territory of the present-day Republic of Austria, has extended its deadline to submit claims to Dec. 31, 2003.

To be eligible, claimants must have been deported to what is now Austria and been forced to work by the Nazis. Children deported along with their parents or born while their mother was engaged in slave or forced work, are also eligible. Some heirs may be able to claim on behalf of the deceased.

Individuals may receive a payment from either the Austrian Reconciliation Fund and the German Foundation, but not both. For applications, visit www.reconciliationfund.at or www.claimscon.org/index.asp?url=austria/forced_labor.

El Al adds flight as tourism to Israel increases

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

El Al is adding a fourth weekly flight from Toronto to Israel – and is planning to add a fifth in the spring – reflecting a surge in tourist traffic to the Jewish state.

A fourth Boeing 767 will be added to the El Al schedule on Dec. 15, while a fifth flight is expected to be added starting March 29, said Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian operations. The flight originates in Tel Aviv and terminates in Los Angeles, with a stopover in Toronto.

The Israeli carrier will operate winter flights on Sunday, Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, he said.

"We are pleased we can offer an additional day in our schedule responding to the demand of our growing list of satisfied passengers," Morais said.

So far this autumn, El Al's aircraft have been full to capacity both to and from Israel. A large number of missions as well as an increase in individual passenger traffic have boosted El Al's Israel-bound numbers while the Toronto–Los Angeles leg of the journey has seen an average of 60 passengers join the flight in Canada, Morais said.

The increased El Al traffic is part of a broader trend that has seen the Israeli tourism industry begin to bounce back after a slump of more than two years. The decline is attributable largely to security concerns related to the Palestinian intifadah.

Judge rejects attempt to stop repeal of tax credit

An Ontario court has ruled that the new Liberal provincial government can proceed with a bill introduced last month that would repeal the tax credit for private-school tuition brought in by the Tories in 2001.

Last week's ruling came in response to a challenge by the Ontario Alliance of Christian School Societies, which sought an injunction to temporarily freeze a section of Bill 2.

Canadian Jewish Congress was not party to the challenge, but said it was closely following the case.

The OACS, which represents 13,500 students in 74 schools, argued that the Liberals did not follow due process under the 1999 Taxpayer Protection Act, which is supposed to prevent tax increases unless they're approved in a province-wide referendum.

In his eight-page decision, Judge Ian Nordheimer of the Ontario Superior Court said an injunction would restrain "the right of the duly elected representatives of the citizens of Ontario to debate and vote on legislation," which "would be a most extraordinary intrusion into the legislative function" that is without precedent.

Nordheimer also said the OACS raised serious issues about interpretation of the Taxpayer Protection Act, and he called into question its validity and ability to bind governments.

The OACS said in a statement that it is disappointed with the decision, but it has not announced whether it will appeal.

The repeal of the Equity in Education Tax Credit will be retroactive to Jan. 1, 2003, cancelling its benefits for the current school year and part of the previous one.

Concluding thoughts on the GA

From the editor's desk

This week, I conclude my observations from the four-day General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities of North America that convened in Jerusalem last month.

Tuesday, Nov. 18

The GA organizers decided to remove the delegates from the many large and small classrooms of the conference centre and, in their place, convert the entire countryside of Israel, as it were, into 55 on-site "classrooms."

That meant bus tours.

Like all bus tourists in Israel, we had to rise early in the morning, virtually ahead of the sun, to assemble on time. We met at Teddy Stadium, a relatively new football field in the south western part of Jerusalem.

At the stadium, we chose from 55 different outings, mounted our buses and headed off in disparate directions.

I chose the performing arts tour. Stops were planned at the Globus Group film studios, the New Israel Opera in Tel Aviv and at a drama theatre. I was excited at the thought of getting a close-up view of these three different aspects of Israeli cultural life.

Once we were settled on the bus and comfortably on our way, our guide told us the itinerary had been changed.

No matter. I was determined to see new sites, learn new things and enjoy the day. I did all three.

Our first destination was the Globus Group Communication Centre in the pine-covered hills of Neve Ilan, a handful of kilometres west of Jerusalem.

We were met by Yoram Globus himself, the chair of the board. We appreciated the fact that this was akin to a busload of tourists at Disneyland in Anaheim, California, meeting with Disney CEO Michael Eisner. Globus remained with our group throughout the visit.

The Globus studio stretches across 60 acres. It is a state-of-the-art complex that houses television studios, movie production lots and corporate offices.

But as impressive as the high-tech centre was, the most compelling feature of our visit there was Globus himself. His is a true-rags to-riches, patriot's story.

Born in Israel, Globus completed his army service in 1963 and headed to the United States to find his way in the film industry, where he became a highly touted, successful film executive in Hollywood. But, as he told us, he did "not want to become a famous person in the United States." He wanted to help build Israel's film industry instead.

From Neve Ilan, we travelled further west to the Israeli army base at Tzrifin. In British Mandate days, the base was called Sarafand. Our purpose was not to see the soldiers stationed there, but to see the ORT School for Technical Administration and Culinary Arts.

ORT is a worldwide school system with a history and a philosphy of teaching good citizenry as well as information, of instilling in their students a sense of self as well as knowledge. Its international headquarters are in London.

ORT schools have served Jewish communities in more than 100 countries for almost 125 years. Some 300,000 students worldwide are currently attending these schools, and 93,000 Jews, Arabs and Druze attend 156 ORT schools and institutions in Israel.

Most of ORT's students come from troubled backgrounds. They are hard-luck kids, sometimes even trouble-makers, but they all come from difficult home environments. And all the children have special learning or behavioural needs.

As Nurit Cohen, one of the Tzrifin counsellors told us, "Most of the students do not want to be here when they arrive. But they know it might be their last, best chance to find that elusive direction."

The school at Tzrifin has been in existence for 25 years. It has 260 students between the ages of 14 and 18, almost half of whom are newly arrived immigrants from the former Soviet Union, Ethiopia and Turkey.

One of this particular school's aims is to develop future army chefs. A program called "Cooking for Peace" attempts to bridge differences by bringing together students and chefs from varied backgrounds, Jewish and Arab. That is why the school is situated in the army base.

We arrived at the school just after noon. The timing was no coincidence. The student chefs and their teachers had prepared lunch for us.

The menu was far beyond a typical bus tour's lunch. It was a fine and robust meal. There was a choice of eight kinds of salad – baby tomatoes with garlic, eggplants with fine herbs, tabbouleh, potato salad with dill, antipasto, avocado in vinaigrette, three-colour pepper salad and fatoush salad – three main dishes – cornish hen with rice and liver, roast shoulder of lamb with mint, fried St. Peter fish with techinah – and two side dishes – rice with lentils or couscous with vegetables. We enjoyed three kinds of desserts – baklavah, mamyl and baked apple in French pastry. Everything on the menu was prepared by the students. They had also baked seven different kinds of breads.

We ate very, very well that afternoon. Afterward, we commended the young chefs and their teachers for their obvious skill. We were as proud of them as we urged them to be of themselves.

After Tzrifin, we travelled to the Eretz Yisrael Museum in north Tel Aviv where we met Ruth Dayan, the founder of the now-defunct line Israeli chain of stores called Maskit that featured crafts by new immigrants to Israel.

Unfortunately, there is no room left in this column to describe the many more beautiful sights that held us in thrall the rest of the day.

The GA was more than an assembly of delegates. It was a wonderful trip to Israel.

BJCC upgrades with $837,000 in capital

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) spent slightly more than $837,000 on capital improvements during the last fiscal year, a jump of more than $600,000 over the year before, according to the centre's annual report.

More than half – about $450,000 – went to upgrade the outdoor pool area. The renovation included such upgrades as new pipes, a filtration system and a new deck. The pool was in dire need of repair after many years of neglect, but is now virtually new, said Brian Yellin, the centre's director of finances.

Money was also spent on renovating the health club and whirlpool, for new exercise equipment and to set up an automated card-access control system for parents with children in the BJCC's day-care centre. The card scanners have made visiting the facility a much smoother and hassle-free experience, Yellin said.

With $100,000 in new athletic equipment, including treadmills, life cycles and elliptical trainers, to be added in next year's budget, the BJCC is making a strong bid to retain and attract new members, he said.

According to its statement of revenue and expenses, the centre recorded a net income surplus of $124 in the year that ended June 30, 2003, down from $84,434 the year before.

WALK FOR EILAT: Bialik Hebrew Day School, along with other Jewish day schools in Toronto, undertook to raise money to provide television sets for the hospital in Eilat. Under the leadership of the grade 6 classes, the studens solicited pledges and culminated the project with a school-wide "Walk for Eilat." The students in the Bialik family raised $15,000.

On the expense side of the financial statement, salaries and employee benefits are the single greatest cost ($3,440,931). Otherwise, "utility costs are killing us," Yellin said. He estimated that the unfreezing of hydro rates from 4.3 cents a kilowatt hour to as much as 5.5 cents will drive up expenses by $50,000 a year.

"That's a significant impact," he said, adding the centre will be forced to trim expenses or find new sources of revenue.

Income from the centre's $2 million in endowments, which go towards operating expenses, might make up the potential shortfall. Last year's returns were poor due to the stock market slowdown, but that promises to turn around in the current fiscal year, Yellin said.

The centre's latest statement also shows that membership fees jumped to $1,759,069 in the last fiscal year, up from $1,545,552 the year before.

Athletic membership is up 15 per cent, driving the new revenue figures, Yellin said. Membership totals, which he declined to divulge, are now at 1997 levels and in the last few years, the centre has turned the corner in stemming a loss of members that followed the near-bankruptcy of the facility 10 years ago.

Not only has "it turned around and we have double-digit growth in the last two years in a row, but our retention rates are at a healthy 90 per cent. People are very loyal," he said.

Yellin said that while tiny, the surplus marks the seventh year in a row the BJCC has broken even or made money. "That's a hell of a change from where we were 10 years ago."

At the time, the BJCC faced bankruptcy as promised donations failed to materialize to pay for the centre's costly expansion. The BJCC was saved from closing by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and since then, the centre's management team has been working to restore membership totals while offering a variety of community services.

The first three years after the federation bailout were marked by losses, but "a lot of money was spent on improving the facility," Yellin said.

Program revenue, at $2,931,301 remains the centre's largest single source of income, raised through camp fees, day-care charges, nursery school and junior kindergarten, as well as cultural programming, fees for the visual arts, photography, painting and pottery. Yellin said that revenue stream "is growing tremendously," with the day-care's 156 spots almost all taken.

Other important sources of revenue included government grants ($317,972), rental income ($596,348), a grant from the United Way of Greater Toronto ($433,128) and $308,009 from donations.

The United Way contribution marked the first time in 10 years that the charitable funding agency has boosted its allocation to the BJCC. The money went toward the facility's family centre and to pre-natal, post-natal and parenting courses.

Consul handles Toronto's Israeli population increase

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

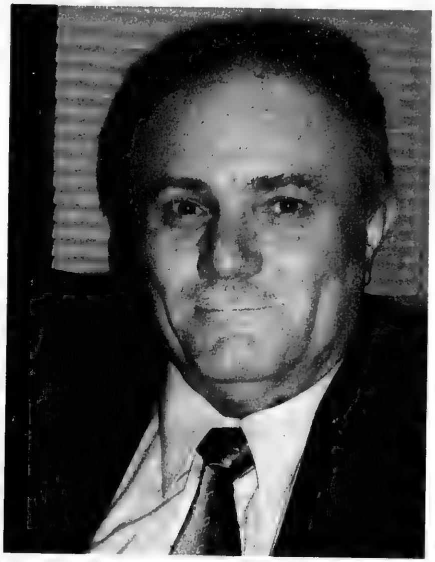
Avraham Lev-Louis is probably the only Israeli diplomat who has served as a Canadian Grenadier Guard in the ceremonial changing of the guard on Parliament Hill, which he did as part of a summer job when he was a student.

He's likely also the only Israeli who spent a summer working for the literacy organization Frontier College, teaching reading and writing skills in northern Ontario communities such as Moosonee and James Bay.

A sabra who moved to Montreal with his family at age 13, Lev-Louis remained in Canada until he was 27, earning a bachelor's degree in psychology from Loyola College. On his return to Israel, he earned his bachelor's degree in social work from Bar-Ilan University and served for two years beyond his required tour of duty of 18 months as a mental health officerin the Israel Defence Forces. He also has an MA in public policy from Tel Aviv University, and has spent a decade as a vocational counsellor for the Ministry of Labour.

In late September, Lev-Louis joined Israel's consulate in Toronto as consul to Ontario and Western Canada, replacing Zehavit Ben Hillel, who returned to Israel. Lev-Louis, who spent the past three years at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, deals with consular affairs, including Israeli passports, and serves as second-in-command to Consul General Ya'acov Brosh.

Lev-Louis, 53, was already over 40 and married with two children when he decided to "take a chance" and change careers, he said in an interview last week.



Lev-Louis

In his first posting, at Israel's embassy in Prague from 1994 to 1997, Lev-Louis did consular and administrative work, and enjoyed the well-preserved historic synagogues and other buildings in what he said was "like an enchanted city." He also served briefly in both Cameroon and Buenos Aires, but has yet to visit the Israeli embassy in his parents' native Bulgaria, where they lived until 1949.

His return to Canada three years ago was less exotic, but it had the welcome perk of bringing him closer to his parents and brother, who still live in Montreal.

His family name, Lev-Louis, reflects the geographic transition and his dual background. Levy, the original name, was changed to Louis when the family moved to Canada, but the future consul needed an Israeli surname when he served in the IDF, and changed his name to Lev.

Toronto's Israeli population has grown dramatically in recent years, resulting in an increased consular load. Including Russians who came from Israel and children of Israelis who may not have ever been in Israel, there are as many as 40,000 to 50,000, Lev-Louis said.

"We get 50 to 60 visitors a day," he said. "In the past six years, there has been an increase of 7,000 to 8,000 Israelis who have immigrated to Toronto and vicinity. Toronto has become the third largest Israeli community in North America, after New York and Los Angeles."

A rising unemployment rate in Israel – now close to 10 per cent – and the three-year-old intifadah have contributed to the increase, he said.

Lev-Louis also deals with "cases that need intervention." Recently, he helped the mother of a young Israeli tourist who'd been hospitalized in Toronto to travel here from Israel and take her home.

"Usually what we do is alleviate hardship if [Israelis] need help with the local authorities."

Because of the increased workload, Lev-Louis is less involved than his predecessor with Israeli culture, but the jazz afficianado – he likes to work to the mellow strains of local jazz radio station CJRT – said he would love to bring Israeli jazz musicians to Toronto.

Mission to Israel promotes investment

May serve as model for future trips, says CIC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A high profile mission of business leaders and journalists led by former premiers Mike Harris of Ontario and Brian Tobin of Newfoundland, could form the model for future business-oriented trips to Israel, said Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

Nathan Jacobson

The 20-person mission, that returned recently from Israel, could also prompt similar visits by Israeli entrepreneurs interested in investing in Canada, he added.

"We are delighted with the success of the trip," said Fogel. Both "the quality of the people who participated and the extent to which they are intent on new missions to explore new enterprises in Israel" reflect "an important new dimension" to the type of work now being pursued by the CIC.

The CIC is planning to roll out one such trip each month, raising Israel's profile among political and business leaders while also incubating possible business ventures. It's all part of an enhanced mission program the CIC has begun implementing in recent months as community advocacy agencies slip into high gear to promote the State of Israel. With increased allocations and support from the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), a committee of UIA Federations Canada, CIC now has the wherewithal to sponsor these kinds of missions, Fogel said.

In addition to Harris and Tobin, the mission included Walter Arbib (Skylink), Leonard Asper (CanWest Global), John Beck (AECON), Matthew Fisher (CanWest News Service), Norman Godfrey (Yorkwood Building Group), Cary Green (Greenwin Properties), Sidney Greenberg (Astral Communications), David Hartnoll, (TaxSave Wyndon CompSave), Martin Himel (Global News), Nathan Jacobson (The West Group of Companies), Jonathan Kay (National Post), Chaim Katzman (First Capital Realty), Kenneth Mariash (Focus Equities), Ucal Powell (Carpenters Union Pension Fund), Moshe Ronen (lawyer; policy consultant), Michael Serruya (Cool Brands), James Smith (Carpenters Union Pension Fund) and Moses Znaimer (CHUM-CityTV).

Mission participants met with Israeli business people, as well as Finance Minster Benjamin Netanyahu; Industry, Trade, Employment and Communications Minister Ehud Olmert; and Premier Ariel Sharon. They were briefed by Canadian diplomats, they encountered representatives of the Palestinian Authority and they toured Israel.

One of the highlights was a helicopter tour and a briefing by military personnel on the security issues facing the country. "People were really amazed at how small it was" and by the difference in prosperity between Israeli and Palestinian Arabs, as shown by their dwellings and crops, said Jacobson.

Jacobson, who has invested in Israeli tech companies and has purchased a home in Tel Aviv, said the helicopter tour illustrated the proximity of Palestinian towns to Israeli population centres. It also showed how Israel's security fence is mostly chain link topped by barbed wire, with more solid barriers along highways which were being targeted by terrorists.

Mike Harris

Jacobson said the participants were impressed with Israel's high tech industry. He said the West Group is interested in bidding on Israeli infrastructure projects and possibly for industries that will be privatized by the Likud government.

Green, a principal at Greenwin and Verdiroc Development Corporation, said he has recently invested in the Israeli high tech industry and is considering further investments in infrastructure projects.

As for the security issue, "there was no gilding of the lily. People are aware of it," he said. However, he found a widespread sense of optimism, quite different than the impression he formed during visits six months or a year ago.

What's more, Green found an upbeat attitude towards the economy, which he suggested "is poised for a turnaround.

"My take is there's a sense of optimism for change in the right direction."

With whom God has shared His wisdom

It is a rare occasion when an editorial is written about a columnist who retires. This week is such an occasion because the retiree himself is a rare individual. This newspaper, along with the entire community, owes him an irredeemably impossible debt. In keeping, therefore, with our people's long tradition of hakarat hatov, acknowledging the good that others have done for us, we pay homage to and thank Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut.

After an association with this paper that has spanned more than three decades and almost a quarter-century as a regular contributor, Rabbi Plaut is putting away his CJN pen.

In truth, however, the retirement is not entirely voluntary.

It has, alas, been forced upon him, upon us, by the cruel, incremental wearing away at his skills and abilities by Alzheimer's disease. In his typically elegant and eloquent way, Rabbi Plaut has now made that fact known to the world. (Please see his column today.) He will contend with the disease as he has contended all his life with other malevolent deniers of humanity – frontally, with courage and with all his strength.

We, his community and his friends, have been the great beneficiaries of that courage and strength – and of a great deal more. One anecdote will illustrate. It involved the widely respected Torah sage, Halachist, posek and scholar, Rabbi Gedalia Felder.

Some years ago, after Rabbi Felder had suffered a debilitating stroke, a tribute honouring the stricken rabbi and showcasing his many publications was held at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue in Thornhill. Though confined to a wheelchair, Rabbi Felder politely and courteously greeted the hundreds of attendees at the doorway. Rabbi Plaut was also there. When he arrived, Rabbi Plaut walked immediately over to Rabbi Felder. The two men embraced like two brothers recalling lost parents, holding each other close lest the moment and the shared recollection slip away.

For some people, the effusive embrace was surprising. After all, the two men were very different, ideological opposites in terms of the practice of their faith. And yet, the respect and affection they felt for each other were palpable and demonstrable for all to see. And perhaps that was part of the point of their embrace. Despite their differences, these two great men embraced – for all to see.

When we wish to express our gratitude for having benefited from the countless bounties of God's wondrous and wonderful world, we usually recite a blessing. It is appropriate therefore that we thank God for giving us the gift of the example, the sagacity, the heart and the weekly columns of Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut.

"Blessed are You, Lord our God, King of the universe who has shared of His wisdom with those who revere Him and who has given of His wisdom to [his creations of] flesh and blood."

Israel's humanitarianism

I want to add to Ellen Tannenbaum's letter about Israel's humanitarian record ("Israel's humanitarianism going unnoticed," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Nov. 13).

This past summer, I volunteered at Save a Child's Heart (SACH) in Israel and saw 22 children ranging in age from four months to 17 years, from Nigeria, Romania, Ghana, Russia, Congo and the Palestinian Authority (PA), being treated for heart problems in the Wolfson Medical Center in Cholon, where SACH provides its services.

Since 1996, 850 children, including 300 from the PA, have been treated by SACH in Israel, as well as 100 children in China and Ethiopia. These children are alive today because of a group of Israeli medical professionals who volunteered their time and expertise to perform life-saving surgeries.

In addition to all this, SACH trains doctors and nurses from its partner countries in all facets of pediatric cardiology. In January 2004, a cardiologist from the West Bank will start training with SACH.

Within the SACH program, Jews, Muslims and Christians work together to give every child – regardless of race, colour, sex, religion or financial consideration – a new lease on life. The compassion and generosity of Israel, as reflected in their dedication, deserves recognition, too.

Tata correction

In the article by Sheldon Kirshner on the Jews of India ("The Jews of India go back a long way," CJN, Nov. 13), a reference is made to the Tatas, a "fabulously wealthy Hindu clan."

In fact, the Tata family belong to the Zoroastrian (Parsi) faith and are not Hindus. They have been one of the leading industrialists and philanthropist families in India for the past few centuries.

Re: Rabbi Kahane memorial

I don't know much about Rabbi Meir Kahane, who founded the far-right Kach political party and the militant Jewish Defense League in New York, and I would probably not agree with all his policies ("Rabbi compares Kach founder to Moshe Rabeinu," CJN, Nov. 27). But I am quite sure he never called for the extermination of all Arabs in the world. He believed there is a war going on for the Land of Israel and he wanted the Jews to win.

The Arabs want the same thing for their side, but they call for the expulsion of all Jews from Israel as well as for their extermination everywhere else. The Arab world engages in vicious anti-Semitic action and praises Hitler's ideas. His Mein Kampf is a perennial bestseller in the Arab world.

Rabbi Kahane never engaged in this type of hate. He just wanted the Arabs out of Israel because he believed it would be impossible to live with them considering their hatred of Jews. We can see this quite clearly now. But he was not against anyone who wanted to live in peace with the Jews.

The Palestinians make no secret of their desire to murder us all. Even the current intifadah and the slaughter of hundreds of Jews will not provide a lesson to the closed minds of the people who would call Kahane a racist.

Response to Gargoyle was wrong

As a Jewish student at the University of Toronto, I can say that Hillel blew the entire Gargoyle incident out of proportion, and The CJN made it worse.

First of all, if anyone actually bothered to read the editorial in question, they would know it was clearly a joke. Secondly, the tone of the editorial was meant to show how stupid racism is, with sarcastic, racist remarks about other cultures as well. Without context, "…shut the f up, you stupid greedy Jew," seems like a pretty terrible thing to say, and even as a joke, it's unfunny, but I don't think it warranted anything more than a simple apology.

I find Hillel's alarmism to be far more troubling than the silly joke. If they are worried about a sarcastic joke leading to racism, what do they think the consequences will be of their overreaction? Isn't it going to lead to more antagonism directed toward Jews? The way the problem was approached was wrong from the beginning.

Hungarians delivered Jews to Nazis

As a Holocaust survivor, I would like to point out some inaccuracies I came across in a passage about a transport from Hungary to Bergen-Belsen in the book The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary, Volume 2 by Randolph L. Braham. I was on such a transport.

Braham writes, "The transport left late in the night of June 30. It was held up for three days at Mosonmagyarovar, near the Austrian border, where it received new route directions… In the end, the passengers were taken along the original route, and given warm food in Vienna and a hot bath in Linz. On July 8, they arrived in Bergen-Belsen, where they were placed in a Bevorzugtenlager, not far from the notorious camp that contained a large number of Hungarian Jewish deportees. There, for a while at least, they were quite well off. They were never subjected to any physical labour and received cigarettes and daily rations of bread, margarine, marmalade and occasionally sausages. Children and the ill also received milk and adequate medical care. They also had ample opportunities for cultural activities and even entertainment."

During the Holocaust, I was on a transport that took the route described above. We were never given "warm food" or a "hot bath." I remember people dying around me from the cramped quarters and lack of food and water on the train. I also remember many of them going mad because of the conditions. In the concentration camps, we were never "quite well off," nor treated or fed as well as Braham describes.

I would like to hear back from anyone who might have been on the same transport as me, who was in Szolnok, Hungary, Strasshof and/or Auspitz, or who can verify the treatment as described in the quote above from Braham's book.

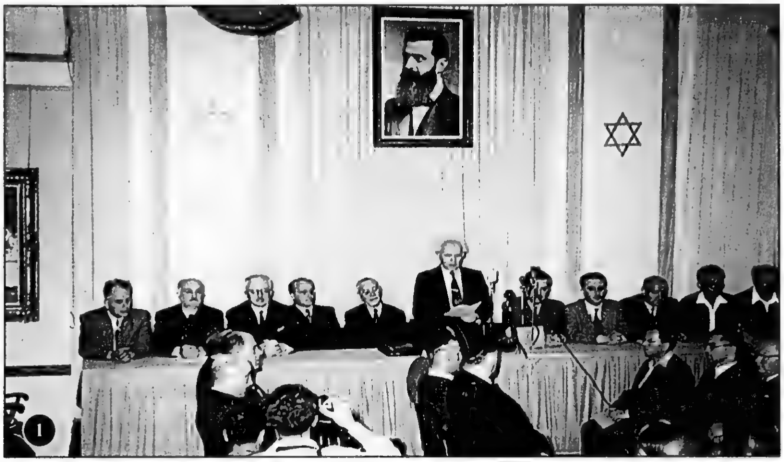
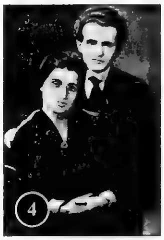
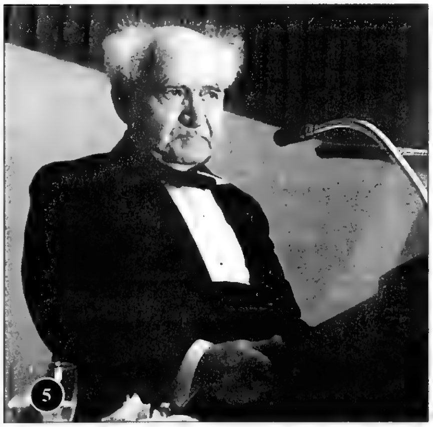
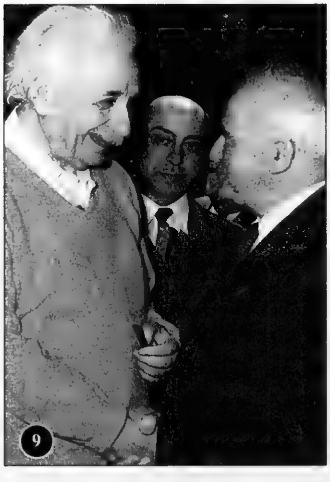
Thirty years since the ‘old man’s’ death

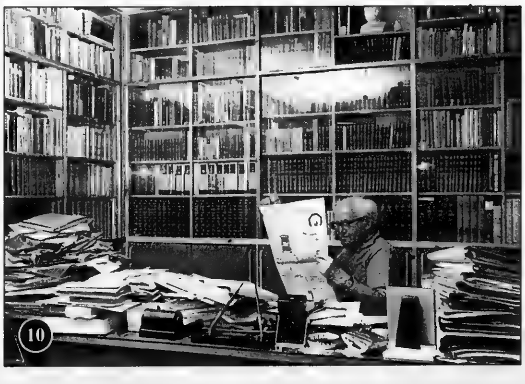




David Ben-Gurion, one of the founding fathers of the state of Israel, died 30 years ago on Dec. 1. The CJN offers a handful of moments that filled his life. 1. Reading Israel’s Declaration of Independence on May 14, 1948. 2. Three generations of mourners march past Ben-Gurion’s grave at Sde Boker on the first anniversary of his death. 3. Overlooking the Negev Desert from an observation point near his home in Sde Boker. 4. Ben-Gurion and his wife Paula in 1917. 5. Looking uncomfortable in a tuxedo (he almost never wore formal garb). 6. Meeting with Arab and Druze members of the Knesset in 1959. 7. At the installation of Shlomo Goren as the Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Tel Aviv in 1971. 8. With the Palmach in the Negev in 1947. Yitzhak Rabin stands to his left. Yigal Allon is at Rabin’s left. 9. With Albert Einstein. 10. In his study at Sde Boker.







Chazak v'ematz

From her I learned that getting old does not necessarily mean wilting away like a dying flower, but now that I am old, I realize that I once took for granted that the youthful alertness of my own mind would last forever, and hopefully be paralleled by my physical capacity.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I had passed my 90th birthday, and at first everything seemed to remain the same. But then, one problem after another began to assail me.

But that was minor, of course, compared to what happened to my beloved Elizabeth, my mate of 65 wonderful and productive years. As you know, she became ill several years ago and was finally claimed by the Angel of Death only a few months ago. Her illness, and now her death, have left me in a state of desolation that I have never before experienced.

In addition, I have come to feel in this last while that I was strangely debilitated. Not only did I have physical problems – I had expected them – but my mind too was not functioning with its usual alacrity. I did not seem to be able to make decisions, and when I finally made them, I often did not carry them out. I did not know why this was happening, and therefore sought medical help.

The diagnosis was that I now suffer, like many people my age – and some younger – from Alzheimer's disease. And I want you, my friends and readers, to know this straight from me.

I will continue to do my best, but my best is no longer what it once was

So, like everyone else, regardless of age or health, I now face a basic question: how exactly, can I do my best in waging a battle against Alzheimer's disease and, of course, for life?

The answer, simple though it may seem, is best expressed by the brief Hebrew expression chazak v'ematz. I will attempt to be as strong as possible and muster up as much courage as possible, knowing that much has been given to me in life, and knowing, as well, that much is in the hands of the Almighty.

And, my friends, I would say the same to you, in whatever battle you must wage for life and for health: chazak v'ematz, be strong and be of good courage, and may you and I be granted the privilege of living for as long as our strength and God afford us.

This is Rabbi Plaut's last regular column for The CJN. He has been associated with the paper for more than 30 years and has been a columnist since July 1980.

Startling life stories from Israelis

When three representatives of Israel at Heart came to speak at my university last month, more than 300 people packed the room.

This was no small feat, considering the event coincided with reading week, a time when the University of Calgary campus is usually empty.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

I had never heard of this organization before. It was established 1½ years ago out of the belief that Israel is being portrayed unfavourably in the media. The group sends out delegations of young Israelis across North America to describe their country and experiences.

It took only a few moments to become fully absorbed in the three young Israelis' unique stories about how they live normal lives in abnormal times.

It really put the petty problems of my own life – which is comparatively quite dull – into perspective.

Amir Frayman, Ron Teicher and Ayelet Gordon specifically addressed the media's portrayal of the Israeli army's incursion into Jenin following a devastating suicide bombing at a Passover seder in Netanya's Park Hotel in March 2002 that killed 29 people and injured 150.

They talked about how one of the only battles in history where more troops lost their lives than civilians was twisted by the media into a cold-blooded massacre.

"We're here to tell you our side of the story," said Amir, 26.

"The media only gives you one side. For instance, in Israel, we hear that everyone in Canada has SARS. Someone was coughing a lot on the plane and we thought to ourselves, Oh my God – I wish I was back home in Israel where it is safe!"

Amir was one of the soldiers called up at the beginning to launch Operation Defensive Shield.

"That day, I went from being a university student wearing a t-shirt, jeans and sneakers to an officer with army boots and a rifle who was responsible for the lives of 30 other soldiers," he recalled.

After 37 days of fighting, he went back to being Amir the student.

Ron's account of monitoring checkpoints to stop suicide bombers from penetrating Jerusalem was also startling. At one point, he had to stop an ambulance, which proved to be an eye-opening experience.

"How bad does stopping an ambulance look on television?" Ron asked. "It had a 50-year-old doctor and a mother with two children aged two and five in it, and it was full of explosives.

"It's hard to understand how these things are possible."

As the grandson of Holocaust survivors, Ron could not describe the feelings he and his soldiers experienced after risking their lives in Jenin only to return home and see "Massacre in Jenin" splashed all over the news.

"We didn't use artillery or the air force – we didn't use any military superiority at all – and these were decisions made by our government so that we could better distinguish between those who were innocent and those who were not.

"I cannot describe what it felt like to go through this and to emerge amidst accusations of being mass killers."

Last to speak was Ayelet, 21, who spoke of her determination to retain her way of life after she heard that an old friend from school was killed in a suicide bombing.

"I refused to change my life and to leave my friends and family. We do things that normal people do in these crazy and abnormal conditions, and try our best to lead a regular life, so that the message is not that terrorism has won."

Though their stories were compelling, there was something about the Israelis' insistence that they do in fact lead normal lives that suggested this wasn't really the case, since people who really are normal don't spend so much time trying to persuade others of it.

Nevertheless, it was a powerful talk. The Israelis never singled anyone out or made judgments, despite a well-received comment from an audience member, who called the Palestinians "filthy Arabs" with "nooses around our necks." It seemed the audience had some catching up to do to reach the Israelis' maturity.

Judaism is more than a nationality

What first struck me on my last trip to Israel was the overwhelming sense of comfort I felt. It was not as if I was going some place new but rather like returning to a familiar second home. Whether it was making sure I got to "my" shwarma guy in the German Colony or returning to the minyan that had been such a part of my life over the summer, I never once felt like I was on a trip.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

I had the amazing opportunity to be one of 52 student leaders from across North America who participated in Hillel International's mission to the United Jewish Communities' General Assembly last month. In the middle of the semester, I put down the books for what was to be an unbelievable week of learning.

One session I attended discussed the deepening spiritual crises facing the Jews of Israel. Just as we in the Diaspora are looking to find ways of connecting to tradition, a huge sector of the Israeli population is searching for the same thing. Traditional practice does not appeal to everyone and it seems that many Jews both in Israel and in the Diaspora need to acknowledge that there is more to our "Jewishness" than religion.

As part of the trip, we spent a day at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Given our political involvement on our campuses, we had well-formulated ideas about programming and the lengths to which we had to go to engage Jewish students. However, none of us could have conceived of the movement now taking place on Israeli campuses to help students engage in a meaningful "Jewish" campus life.

It is nearly impossible to imagine such a need when almost the entire student population on every Israeli campus is Jewish. But just as we in the Diaspora go to university to develop our sense of selves, so too do our Israeli counterparts. Because of the nature of Israeli society where so many see their home in Israel as defining their Judaism, there is a generation of students looking to connect to their Jewish identity in a way that complements their citizenship, language and nationality.

It is easy to forget that Israel is a 55-year-old democracy that, in addition to fighting a war against terrorism and a war of survival, is also engaged in a constant battle to define itself, to find a means of reconciling religion and democracy, security and plurality. It is a country of depth and diversity trying to achieve a liberal and modern ideology while remaining true to an ancient history and culture.

The General Assembly itself opened in the wake of the tragic synagogue bombings in Istanbul, and, as I write my column, the latest news is about a Jewish cemetery being desecrated in the south of France. When we see terror and violence hit our brothers and sisters in Israel, we often find it easier to deal with, attributing the problem to the scores of political and social issues in Israel. But when we see Jews victimized elsewhere, it becomes a little more difficult to turn our heads and explain the tragedies away.

Anti-Semitism is an issue we tend to sweep under the rug. But looking at the state of the world, it is time to stop being complacent. There remains much to accomplish, much to learn and explore. We have a homeland engaged in the most modern of debates while grounded in the most ancient of histories.

American philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, who presented at the GA a project that would see every Jewish newborn receive a voucher toward early childhood Jewish education and a free trip to Israel, was right when he articulated the gravity of the challenge facing our future generations. We cherish the security of our assimilated lives, and in so doing, are becoming more and more divorced from our Jewish ones. At the very least, we have to take a step outside of ourselves and recognize the significance of the people we are a part of. Judaism has survived throughout the ages. We take for granted that it will continue to, but unless we know why it is here and what role it is to play in our lives, we have no guarantees for the future.

The Kirshner File

Shanghai - a haven for Jewish refugees

From the observation deck of the Oriental Pearl TV Tower, the tallest in Asia at 468 metres, the panoramic view of Shanghai – resurgent China's showcase business centre – is spectacular, even on a misty day.

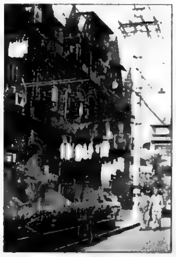
Sheldon Kirshner in Shanghai

Look straight ahead and the Bund, the famous promenade along the Huangpu River, comes into focus. Look closer and the faint outlines of Nanjing Road, the city's premiere shopping mecca, can be seen. A rightward glance reveals the massive Jin Mao Tower, which is emblematic of China's headlong rush into urban modernity. To the left is the low-lying, brownish-coloured Hongkou district, a ragged remnant of old China where European Jewish refugees from Nazi oppression found a safe haven in the 1930s and 1940s.

Nothing more than a reeking slum back then, and now a rancid reminder of a bygone era, Hongkou was, and still is, one of Shanghai's poorest neighbourhoods.

When Jews, mainly from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia, first disembarked in Shanghai, they were free to live anywhere. Most crowded into Hongkou, with its cheap, gloomy Victorian terrace flats and its pungent outdoor markets.

But the situation changed by 180 degrees in 1943 when Japan – a rising Asian power that had occupied Manchuria in 1931 and had invaded the rest of eastern China in 1937 – forced Shanghai's stateless Jewish residents into Hongkou. The area had been a Japanese enclave, or extra-territorial concession, before violence, chaos and anarchy enveloped China.



Typical buildings in Hongkou

Stymied by the high walls many countries, including Canada, had erected to keep them out, European Jews flocked into Shanghai by the thousands because it was an open city that did not require visas, passports or other documentation. In this respect, Shanghai was one of the precious few places where Jews fleeing Nazi aggression could find shelter.

When the vanguard of some 20,000 Jewish refugees first arrived, they encountered an already established Jewish community. It consisted of Iraqi and British Jews who had settled in Shanghai – a vibrant mercantile port – around the mid-19th century, and of Russian Jews who had fled pogroms in the 1880s and Communism after the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution.

For the latest newcomers, who had been accustomed to bourgeois comforts and never expected to stay long, Shanghai, a whole different world in itself, came as something of a shock. Hongkou, in particular, offended their sensibilities. A maze of hutongs (narrow, interconnected, dimly-lit alleyways with traditional Chinese cinderblock dwellings), Hongkou was congested, dirty and smelly, with open sewers and a lack of flush toilets. In summer, the humidity was unbearable, and in winter, the cold was bone-numbing.

In a compromise measure, Japan, an ally of Germany, herded the refugees into Hongkou. The Germans wanted to load them onto ships and starve them to death, according to one account. But Japan, not being obsessed by anti-Semitism or racial fantasies, refused. The Japanese mollified the Germans by forcing the Jews into Hongkou, a ghetto officially referred to as "The Designated Area for Stateless Refugees."

Bounded by Gongping Road on the west, Tongbei Road on the east, Huiming Road on the south and Zhoujianzi Road on the north, Hongkou covered about five square kilometres. The refugees primarily congregated around Huoshan Road, Chang Yang Road, Dong Chang Zhi Road, An Guo Road, Ping Liang Road and Jing Zhou Road.

Having arrived virtually penniless, they depended on soup kitchens, shelters and clinics financed by Baghdadi Jews and the American Joint Distribution Committee.

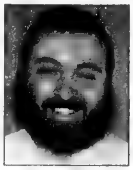
The refugees eventually created a vital, self-contained universe in Hongkou, sometimes known as Little Vienna. Cafes, restaurants, bakeries and butcher shops sprouted. Newspapers, magazines, theatres, orchestras, cabarets, sports clubs, soccer leagues and mutual self-help groups emerged.

To what extent Jews mingled with the local Chinese inhabitants is uncertain. But what is beyond doubt is that Chinese people were tolerant of the newcomers and did not show signs of disgust or anti-Semitism. Anti-Jewish animus is simply not part of Chinese culture and civilization.

Although Jews endured food scarcities, cramped housing conditions and disease, they were often better off than the majority of their Chinese neighbours. And compared to Nazi-occupied Europe, Shanghai was a paradise.

U.S. bombing raids late in World War II, however, killed about 30 refugees.

With the end of hostilities, the refugees began leaving Shanghai, many for the United States, Canada, Britain, Israel and Australia. The process was hastened by the proclamation of the People's Republic of China on Oct. 1, 1949.



Rabbi Shalom Greenberg

Today, in a small park off Huoshan Road, where Chinese men and women dutifully perform Tai Chi calisthenics to the sound of music, there is a black plaque commemorating the Hongkou ghetto era.

Foreign visitors, mostly Jews, often visit the plaque, which is inscribed in English, Chinese and Hebrew.

They also visit Ohel Moishe Synagogue, which was built by Russian Jews on Chang Yang Road at the turn of the last century and is now a museum called the Jewish Refugee Memorial Hall.

Wang Fa Liang, a mild-mannered Chinese man who was born in 1919 and vividly remembers the refugees, takes visitors around and delivers lectures about Shanghai's Jewish past.

On the second floor is a picture exhibition tracing the trajectory of Shanghai's association with Jews. Photographs of Israeli and foreign dignitaries who have been here – the late Israeli president Chaim Herzog, former Israeli prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Benjamin Netanyahu, German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, and Austrian President Thomas Klestil – adorn the walls. As I left one morning, a group of voluble Israeli tourists poured in.

A street sign in Shanghai where Jewish refugees lived in the 1930s and 1940s

The ground-floor sanctuary of the former shul contains six long dark brown wooden benches. The bimah is bare. Lilting Chinese music is heard from a neighbouring building.

Adjacent to the sanctuary is a mixed media art exhibit of paintings, drawings and sculptures produced by such Canadian artists as Charles Pachter and Tootsie Halbert.

Outside, on roads humming with traffic and streets teeming with pedestrians, sit the dilapidated, fading red-brick row houses that formerly accommodated the refugees. Laundry lines – trailing white sheets, shirts, blouses, pants and undergarments – are attached to grey electricity poles planted on sidewalks.

Shanghai once had seven functioning synagogues. Five shuls, one of which housed the Mir Yeshiva, were torn down in the name of urban development.

Ohel Rachel, constructed by the legendary Sassoon family in 1920 and extensively renovated by the municipality in 1998, is far from Hongkou, in the northwestern part of Shanghai. Weathered looking, with vines and leaves streaming down its palatial columns, Ohel Rachel is generally closed to the public, and advance arrangements must be made to see it. When former U.S. president Bill Clinton visited Shanghai five years ago, he and his wife, Hillary, were given a tour of the venerable Sephardi synagogue.

The Shanghai Jewish Center – which is run by Rabbi Shalom Greenberg and his wife, Dina, under the auspices of the Chabad movement – conducts high holiday services at Ohel Rachel.

Rabbi Greenberg, a 32-year-old Israeli from B'nai Brak, opened the centre, in western Shanghai, a year-and-a-half ago. Catering to expatriates ranging from businessmen and students to diplomats and tourists, the centre – the only one of its kind in the city – is fitted with a synagogue, a pre-school and a kosher café. Shabbat dinners attract scores of diners from Shanghai's Jewish population of roughly 400. A mikvah will be installed in 2004.

"We're very grateful that the Chinese government lets us operate here, which is something they don't have to do," said the rabbi's 29-year-old wife, a native of Cleveland, Ohio, and the mother of three children ranging in age from one to four.

"They're happy to have us here," observed her husband. "We are the social life of Jewish people in China. China is growing and developing, and our goal is to establish a complete Jewish life here."

All Jews, be they secular or observant, are welcome, his wife added. "We don't believe in labels. We celebrate Judaism together."

As did the Jewish refugees of Shanghai several generations ago.

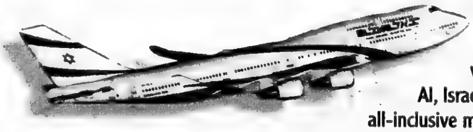
Lighting the Way to Israel

Millions of candles. A multitude of events. Timeless traditions. Somehow Chanukah symbolizes everything that makes Israel so attractive and so important to see. So, with Chanukah in mind, here's a trio of reasons among many for making a commitment now to visit Israel as soon as possible.

OUR HISTORY HAPPENED HERE – The roots of Jewish life are alive in Israel. The Hasmonean family, popularly known to us as the Maccabees, began their revolt against religious repression in Modi'in, now a thriving, contemporary community, about half an hour from Jerusalem. The Hasmonean soldiers marched along a narrow road from Modi'in to Jerusalem to sanctify and re-dedicate the Temple. Archaeological experts have discovered many remnants of those days along the way.

ISRAEL IS FOR CHILDREN – Chanukah illustrates how much kids can do in Israel. There's the Festigal festival - a spectacular Chanukah production, just for children, with performances scheduled for nine Israeli cities. Children can bring their parents to join a modern-day Maccabi at the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem as he searches the museum's galleries for contents of the ancient Temple. There's the Israel Children's Museum in Holon to delight little people. And how about walnut, sesame, fish, castor and radish seed oil as Chanukah lighting alternatives? It's all at the Neot Kedumim Biblical Landscape Reserve between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.



ISRAEL IS WITHIN EASY REACH – Israel has never been so convenient to visit. There's at least one commercial flight every day of the week – either through El Al, Israel's national airline, Air Canada or other carriers – plus dozens of expertly packaged, all-inclusive missions. Just call us at the Israel Government Tourist Office and we'll be happy to help you get there.

'I have grown older and hopefully wiser'

Rabbi Plaut retires from The CJN

Rabbi Plaut said he places such importance on communicating with people that he attends Holy Blossom's weekly Out of the Cold Program in order to talk to the guests.

"So many people have no one to talk to. I go to the temple every Thursday and I talk to these people about [how they manage] with no job and no money.

"Many of them live fractured lives. They never learned how to converse with people. They can talk, but they can't converse. They are not used to people sitting down and wanting to know all about them."

Seniors, especially, need human contact, Rabbi Plaut said. "Older people have a lot to teach. I am an example. I use to be young, bright and arrogant, but in the last many years, I have left my arrogance behind and the brightness has darkened. I have grown older and hopefully wiser."

Older people are forgotten by society, he said. "The fact that I have 'x' number of degrees doesn't matter. It is unfortunate but true that old people are discounted. The word 'old' was once an accolade, but today that is the opposite. The only time 'old' is an accolade is when someone is talking about antiques.

"Being old is no fun. Most people scrape along and have a difficult time. Loneliness is a great problem because family and friends begin to diminish, and there are fewer and fewer people around."

'It is my privilege to be here'

Since his wife Elizabeth died this fall – they were married 65 years – he is lonely, he said, because even though she was hospitalized for some time, he would visit her every day.

"Having religion though, helps me, as it can help any person of any age. It is especially a support when a person gets old or ill.

"I see a lot of older people in synagogue, and I think that is because they realize there is something more in life.

"It helps me to realize that there is a presiding authority – that there is a higher power at play that is more important than any individual. I can't prove it, but a lot of people are certainly on my side in that line of thinking."

He also keeps busy with activities.

"I play tennis indoors all year, and I play golf in the summer. In Europe before the war, I was an amateur soccer player. I played in Germany, France and Italy. I've always known how important it is to get up and get moving."

"Looking back – I seem to do more and more of that lately – I have had a wonderful life. I had a perfect marriage, Holy Blossom has been wonderful to me, my readers were my friends, and I have met some of the greatest people, including Eleanor Roosevelt, Golda Meir and Martin Luther King.

"Living in Canada has also been a wonderful opportunity. It is my privilege to be here."

Manley & Sonia Tessler make extraordinary investment in Israel's future.
"We need Israel and Israel needs us," say Tesslers with 5th million dollar purchase of Israel Bonds.

"To My Dear Friends of Beth Emeth Synagogue:

My name is Manny Tessler and my wife is Sonia. I have just arrived back from Israel on Rabbi Morrison's mission. He really does deserve a "Yashar Koach." It was a great privilege to take part in this trip.

Sonia and I suffered through the terrible Holocaust and the pain never ends.

To see what Israel has built out of the ashes of death reminds me how much we need Israel. But Israel needs us too.

We are purchasing our 5th million dollar bond to continue the great work. It is thrilling to see how those funds are used. I challenge you all to do what you can to ensure the security and growth of our beloved State of Israel."

Cantors take to the stage for pre-Chanukah concert

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When nine cantors took to the stage at the recent Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund gala pre-Chanukah concert at Beth Sholom Synagogue, the crowd knew they were in for something special.

The group had the audience clapping from the opening song of Shehecheyanu to the finale, when moderator and Adath Israel Congregation cantor A. Eliezer Kirshblum led his peers in rousing renditions of Oseh Shalom and Am Israel Chai.

The cantors included Eric Moses, Beth Sholom; Yaakov Motzen, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation; Gershon Silins, Temple Sinai; Ben Silverberg, Shaar Shalom; Marshall Loomer, Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am; Aaron Bensoussan, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue; Tibor Kovari Beth Tikvah; and guest cantor Ben Zion Miller, Beth El-Boro Park.

They are all members of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, a group of Reform, Conservative and Orthodox cantors in the city.

Through its concerts, the council has raised thousands of dollars under the auspices of the Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund, which is chaired by Kirshblum. The funds are channelled to various local and Israeli organizations and charities.

As well, cantorial and Jewish music scholarships have been awarded to Canadian students.

All proceeds from this concert are earmarked for Mazon Canada, an organization that raises funds from within the Jewish community for non-denominational allocation to front-line hunger organizations in Canada, and Zareinu, a school and treatment centre for children with disabilities.

Kirshblum first met Miller, who sang Ivdu et HaShem and Ribon HaOlamim, when he was at a cantorial convention in the Catskill Mountains in New York. The cantors would sing in the lobby of the hotel, he said, "and I was stirred by his voice.

"He was at a shul in Montreal at the time, and I asked him if he would consider coming to Toronto. [Before becoming cantor in Boro Park] he was chazzan at Shaarei Tefilah."

Kovari, who came to Toronto from Bucharest via Halifax – his mother came to the concert from Romania to see him – sang Szol A Kakas Mar in Hungarian, a classical piece about the coming of Mashiach.

Silverberg, in concert for the first time, sang Shomer Yisrael, a lively tune in which he beseeched God not to desert the people of Israel.

The cantors ended the first half of the program with a chassidic medley arranged by Charles Heller, composer and arranger at Beth Emeth.

Instrumentalists were Brahm Goldhamer and Nathan Rosen on piano, Shelley Miller on bass guitar, Adam David on drums, Koriann Forrester on flute and Jordan Klapman on keyboard.

Jewish Life

Jewish coats of arms

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

The Rothschilds had one. The Disraelis had one. The Montefiore, Mocatta and Sassoon families each had one. And so, according to some interpretations, did each of the 12 tribes of Israel.

Popular with the Jewish aristocracy in Europe since medieval times, Jewish coats of arms once seemed a sort of harmless conceit for the rich. Today, for a small sum, almost anyone can purchase a coat of arms from Internet and mail-order merchandisers that pretend to know all about our Cohen, Levinsky or Silverstein family forebears. Regrettably, such ill-gotten honours are almost always bogus.

According to some scholars, Jewish coats of arms were legitimized the moment the Lord told Moses and Aaron (Numbers 2:2) that "the Israelites shall camp each with his standard under the banners of their ancestral house."

According to an authority quoted in the Encyclopedia Judaica, the tribal standards "served the same purpose as heraldic devices."

Each tribe, accordingly, was associated with its own emblem; for Judah, it was the lion. Because the entire Jewish people is said to be descended from Judah, the lion has become our predominant heraldic symbol.

Thus, a crowned and winged lion is prominent in the coat of arms granted in 1622 to Jacob Batsheba Schmieles, the first European Jew to receive that honour and become a knight of the Holy Roman Empire. Similarly, the Montefiore family crest boasts a fierce-looking lion and antlered elk, as well as two banners with the word "Jerusalem" in Hebrew. Likewise, a lion and unicorn flank the Rothschild crest.

Essentially a token of assimilation into the surrounding Christian mercantile culture, Jewish coats of arms often utilize Stars of David, menorahs, Hebrew lettering and other Judaic elements. Crowns, too, despite their traditional use to glorify the Torah, are also common.

Jewish aristocrats in Old Europe adopted heraldic insignia as a means of demonstrating their social equality while, not incidentally, trumpeting their wealth and success. After 1656, the English happily granted coats of arms to worthy Jewish applicants provided their families had been naturalized.

The largest Jewish subgroup to receive coats of arms were former Sephardi families who, as secret (Marrano) Jews, often took on the names of the Christian families that supported them. Da Costa, Solis, Suasso, Mendes, Pinto, Pereira and Teixeira are some of many Jewish families that received the prestigious emblems.

Heraldic icons often symbolize centuries of family history. Moses Montefiore based his coat of arms on a family badge embroidered on an ark curtain presented centuries earlier by Judah Leone Montefiore to the Ancona synagogue.

To cite two Canadian examples, Toronto businessman-philanthropist Sigmund Samuel (1867-1962) was proud of the coat of arms granted to his family by Oliver Cromwell in 1670. A replica adorns a stained-glass window in the Sigmund Samuel Library on the University of Toronto campus. And Israel Asper was granted a coat of arms just months before he died in October. It features three maple leafs inlaid with Stars of David and a lion holding a lightning bolt and scales of justice, symbolizing Asper's communications empire and his standing as a lawyer.

For most of us, our recent family histories aren't illustrious enough to merit coats of arms. A JewishGen jester probably got it right when he joked not long ago that his own hypothetical Horowitz family crest would have had "a picture of a push-cart in the centre, some needlework in the upper left (tailor), and an illustration of my grandfather (alleged horse-thief) being run out of town."

Rather than a coat of arms above the lintel, look to the doorpost of a Jewish home for a better and more universal symbol of the family's glorious and accomplished past.

A ruthless tyrant, a psalm of comfort

Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography*, by Barry Rubin and Judith Colp Rubin, Oxford University Press, $34.95.

It is easy to hate Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. He is ugly, malignant, deceitful and murderous. A ruthless terrorist, he is also a thief who has amassed a vast personal fortune. A 2002 study ranked Arafat the world's sixth-richest political leader, with an estimated $300 million (US) in wealth that is not being used to build up the Palestinian economy or to benefit those under his rule.

Books
Bernard Baskin

At 74, Arafat is the wily survivor of several wars, periods of exile and many diplomatic battles. But the authors of this engrossing and well-researched biography point out that over four decades he has been "unable to bring his people victory, peace or an independent state. His is a record of political failure almost unequalled in history."

Why has he remained militant and uncompromising? Because, assert the authors, he thus maintains his popularity among his own people and in the Arab world. When he initiates violence, it stifles Palestinian criticism of the incompetence and corruption around him, his unfulfilled promises and failed prophecies. His intransigence is repeatedly rewarded with western concessions, too. The authors say he concluded that the revolution could go on forever and he is not likely to make peace, no matter how attractive Israeli proposals are.

An inveterate liar, he has alleged that there have been massacres of Palestinians where none have occurred. He has talked of PLO victories when the group has suffered heavy losses. Some of his falsehoods in recent years have been utterly fantastic – that there was never a Jewish temple in Jerusalem, that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is planning to settle 500,000 Afghan Jews on the West Bank.

Barry Rubin is director of the Global Research in International Affairs Center and his wife Judith is a veteran journalist and author. Their book is a comprehensive, readable and balanced account of the life and fortunes of a treacherous personality against the background of a turbulent Middle East.

The Lord is My Shepherd*, by Harold S. Kushner, Random House, $29.95.

The 23rd Psalm is a source of comfort and courage in the face of grief and fear. It is the only biblical passage that many people can recite in its entirety.

Rabbi Kushner, renowned for his book When Bad Things Happen to Good People, has pondered the meaning of this succinct poem for more than 40 years. He regards it as a unique literary creation that conveys the distilled wisdom of generations, a microcosmic statement in just 57 Hebrew words that presents an entire theology about life and loss.

Each of the 15 chapters in this slender volume discusses one line of the psalm, taking into account the culture in which it was written as well as its meaning for the present day.

Although the book is presented in a conversational and accessible manner, it doesn't eschew serious and difficult questions. What does it mean to lack for nothing? How are we to understand the phrase, "He restores my soul"? Is there special significance to the action, "You anoint my head with oil"? Is "You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies" a form of revenge, or is it a way of indicating God's unfailing care and nurture?

The author draws meaningfully from rabbinic Judaism, but also from such diverse sources as Sigmund Freud, Woody Allen films, A. E. Housman, Martin Buber and Herman Wouk.

In interpreting "He restores my soul," Kushner writes, "God is the magnetic force that guides people through the dark night and brings them into a brighter world."

The book's overarching message is that evil and suffering are inevitable, but that God provides the necessary resources of spirit to overcome our fears and return us to health and wholeness.

Sufganiyot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you think of Chanukah, the first food that comes to mind is probably the latke. While the potato pancake certainly has its virtues, its oily cousin the sufganiyah has its own unique pleasures. Today, we troll the Internet to see what it has to say about the jelly-filled, powdered sugar-topped, doughy concoction.

The Jewish Highway

According to cookbook author Joan Nathan, the Hebrew word "sufganiyah" comes from the Greek sufgan, meaning "puffed and fried." Traditionally, she says [http://starchefs.com/Holidays/99/recipe_03.html], they "consist[ed] of two rounds of dough sandwiching some jam, and the jam always ran out during the frying. Today, with new injectors on the market, balls of dough can be deep-fried first and then injected with jam before being rolled in sugar. This is a much easier, quicker way of doing them. And no jam escapes."

If you'd like to try making some, the Jewish-Food Recipes Archives has 21 variations, including chocolate, no-yeast and raised potato. And lest we forget that we are living in Canada in wintertime, there's even a variation that uses apple cider and a maple glaze [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/sufindex.htm].

A sufganiyah wouldn't be a sufganiyah without hot oil. But that doesn't mean kids can't join in the fun making them. The Epicurious Web site has a family-friendly recipe that's divided into tasks for kids, such as sifting the flour; tasks for kids and adults, such as kneading the dough; and tasks only adults should tackle – dropping the doughnuts into the hot oil [http://food. epicurious.com/run/recipe/viewid=40003].

Can latkes and sufganiyot live in harmony? They do in Naomi Silbermintz's kitchen, thanks to a recipe for Yerushalmi-style sufganiyot, in which a yeast mixture is dropped by the spoonful into an inch of oil. Check out the recipe while learning about her family history.

"My grandmother was a Yerushalmit. She was born in 1910 in Jerusalem to a family whose roots go back only to Jerusalem. (They never were in the Diaspora.) Every Chanukah, when we visited my grandmother, she made these. My mother always said that they are the precursors to jelly-donut type sufganiyot." [http://www.jewishfood-list.com/recipes/desserts/sufganiyotyerushalmi01.html].

Sufganiyot may be popular in your home, but even if you double or triple your recipe, you won't be able to compete with Angel's Bakery in the Kiryat Moshe neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Angel's begins its preparations a month before the holiday to fry up more than a quarter-million doughnuts every 24 hours during the eight-day festival. Each batch uses 100 kilos of dough and makes 1,600 doughnuts. To follow the sufganiyot on their path down the assembly line and into customers' mouths, check out the article "A Hole in One" from the Jerusalem Post [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Hanukka/dassi.html].

I'm not sure whether Angel's Bakery was involved, but back in Chanukah of 1997, some Israelis with time on their hands tried to set a record. They erected a 12-foot structure consisting of 6,400 sufganiyot near the town of Afula. As the History Channel Web site delicately puts it, "The blob was dismantled later, and the sufganiyot were distributed to Israeli soldiers serving along the border with Lebanon." No word whether the oily pyramid ever drew the attention of the folks from Guinness [http://www.historychannel.com/exhibits/holidays/hanukkah/feats.html].

Digging into a typical sufganiyah can leave you with 18 grams of fat and 250 calories. There are alternatives, some healthier than others. You can try yours made of whole wheat [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/sufgan12.htm] oven-fried [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Q12121CA6] or no fry at all [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/nofrydou.htm]. But these alternatives are rare: when I searched the Internet for "sufganiyot" and its various spellings, I came up with more than 2,000 references. When I added the term "low calorie" I was down to about nine hits.

If the calories don't get you, something else may. Somebody at the Kolel Web site is a walking survivor [http://www.kolel.org/pages/holidays/Chanukah_customs.html]. "I have a small scar on my lip from boiling hot custard shooting out of a fresh sufganiyah bought from a street vendor in Jerusalem. For years now that little ridge on my inner lip has been a year-round reminder of the sweetness [and heat] of Chanukah."

Mark Mietkiewicz is a Toronto-based Web site producer who writes, lectures and teaches about the Jewish Internet. He can be contacted at highway@rogers.com.

I'm a Scrooge on Chanukah

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

At about this time every year, I find myself in an unfortunate predicament and feeling like a Scrooge of sorts. This happens whenever my sons invariably bring home their Chanukah project, the chanukiyot (menorahs) they each make at school, and I inform them that they cannot be lit in our home. I don't want to be mean or to dismiss their accomplishment, it is just that we follow the Halachah as set out for Sephardim in the Shulchan Aruch.

Through A Sephardi Window

Rav Yosef Karo of Tzfat, author of the Shulchan Aruch, rules that each home must have a single chanukiyah lit by the head of the household. On the other hand, Rabbi Moshe Isserles of Krakow (the Ramah) writes in his glossary for the benefit of Ashkenazim that each male member does his independent lighting, each with his own menorah.

In our Sephardi household, I try to explain to my very disappointed boys that we follow Sephardi custom.

To be sure, this custom stems from a very strange situation: Rav Karo bases his opinion on the position of the Tosafists, 12th-century Franco-German biblical commentators, while the Ramah bases his ruling on the view of Maimonides.

Go figure, a total reversal. Sephardi Halachah based on an Ashkenazi ruling, Ashkenazi Halachah based on a Sephardi ruling.

A reason for this reversal has been proposed by Rabbi Ezekiel Katzenellenbogen of Hamburg (1714-1749). Each community, he claimed, came up with its custom and later altered it for the same reason: religious persecution or the lack of it. In times when communities enjoyed relative freedom, each household celebrated the holiday by proudly placing the chanukiyah in front of their home. Beside every door, the light of a single chanukiyah glowed with its message of religious freedom. Passersby would see the number of candles and would know what day of the eight-day festival it was – something that would be too confusing if there was a chanukiyah for each male member of the household.

But in times of difficulty, this public expression was out of the question. The lighting of the chanukiyot continued, but in the privacy and confines of people's homes. Indoors, all male members could now light a chanukiyah as only the family would see it. Here there would not exist any confusion as to the day of the holiday.

And so, as political realities shifted and shifted again, the rabbis' rulings on this custom shifted to meet these realities.

From talmudic times, the chanukiyah was lit outdoors. Apparently, Maimonidies lived in times of persecution and hence ruled that it should be lit indoors and by all men of the household. On the other hand, Rav Karo wrote the Shulchan Aruch at a time of calm, and hence the lighting was outdoors, one menorah per household. This was not the case for his contemporary, the Ramah, who ruled that the custom should be to light indoors and everyone should light it. Evidently, the Tosafists, who ruled that one chanukiyah should be lit, must have lived in a time of religious freedom.

All this may explain the quirky reversal. But will my little boys understand why their father won't let them light their own crafted chanukiyah?

Canadian visitors in October up 29% from last year

Canadian visitors to Israel increased by 29 per cent in October over the same period the year before, from 2,281 to 2,945, said Samara Bordan, a spokesperson for the Israel Government Tourism Office in Toronto.

"It turned out to be a very strong month. Missions were busy, people were busy. We've experienced it each month beginning in the spring," she said.

In the period from January to the end of October, Canadian tourism to Israel increased by 19 per cent over the same period in 2002. In all, 23,539 Canadians visited Israel in the first 10 months of 2003 compared to 19,790 in the first 10 months of 2002, she said.

American numbers showed even greater strength. In all, 28,526 travelled to Israel in October compared to 16,069 the year before – a jump of 78 per cent. Altogether, 210,266 Americans visited Israel in the first 10 months of the year, compared to 163,153 from January to October 2002, Bordan said.

"We began to see the change when the war in Iraq ended. We've seen an increase since then," she added.

Bordan and Morais attributed the rise in numbers to pent-up demand and to word-of-mouth reports from earlier visitors that life in Israel has returned more or less to normal, with shops, restaurants and other facilities operating as usual.

Stanley Morais

"I think people have adapted to the situation," said Morais. "They realize that it might not be a perfect situation in Israel, but it's Israel and we have to visit."

Morais said that beginning in January, prices will likely change to reflect a 28 per cent increase in landing fees being charged at Toronto's Pearson International Airport. The fare to Israel should rise by about six or seven per cent, he said.

In other developments, El Al recently announced it was adding an extra flight through New York. Earlier, the airline added flights from Brussels, Madrid, Milan, Rome and Zurich.

El Al recorded a profit of $61 million (US) in the third quarter, its best result in 10 years.

Temple Mount ban was 'serious mistake,' archeologist says

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

Judaism's holiest site could have been under Jewish control today if the Chief Rabbis of Jerusalem had known in 1967 what archeologists know today, says a leading expert.

"The Chief Rabbis of Jerusalem made a serious mistake when they forbade Jews from going on to the Temple Mount immediately after Israel re-claimed Jerusalem following the 1967 war," Dan Bahat told a recent gathering co-sponsored by Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and the Israel Government Tourism Office.

Banning Jews from the Temple Mount after the 1967 war "made it easy for the Israeli government to hand the keys over to Muslims," said Bahat, the director of excavations at the Western Wall tunnels since 1985 and one of Israel's leading archeologosts.

Muslims know the Temple Mount as Haram al-Sharif (Noble Sanctuary), the third holiest Muslim site in the world. The Waqf, an Islamic trust, manages and controls access to the controversial site.

Bahat regrets rabbinic decision

Bahat said the rabbis sought to prevent Jews from walking anywhere on the Temple Mount, because they believed the location of the Holy of Holies from the First and Second temples is unknown.

But Bahat said there is archeological and historical evidence that the Dome of the Rock is built on top of the Holy of Holies, which contradicts the rabbis' beliefs.

The Holy of Holies was the most sacred part of both the First and Second temples. Only the High Priest was allowed to enter it and only on Yom Kippur. According to the Bible, it's said to be located toward the rear of the Tabernacle and surrounded by a thick curtain. The famous Ark of the Covenant was kept there.

"Information we have today, as a result of various historical accounts and evidence uncovered through archeological digs around the site, can help us pinpoint exactly where the Holy of Holies is located on the Temple Mount," he said.

"Therefore, we know where we can and can't walk on the Temple Mount in order not to desecrate the holy places."

While acknowledging that there at least two other competing theories about the location of the Temples, Bahat said he bases his ideas about the location of the Holy of Holies on various sources: the writings of the ancient Jewish scholar Josephus Flavius, who witnessed the destruction of the Second Temple; on the Mishnah, which describes the First Temple; on parts of the Hebrew and Christian bibles; and on recent archeological findings.

Bahat's theory also relies heavily on the natural topography of Jerusalem and what is known about how King Herod, who enlarged and refurbished the Second Temple, constructed other buildings throughout the country.

The Muslims rebuilt the Temple Mount after they conquered Jerusalem in 638. They built the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock, the latter being erected around the rock where Muslims believe the prophet Muhammad was carried off to heaven by the angel Gabriel.

For Jews, the Temple Mount is the site where two Temples stood over a period of some 1,000 years. The first, known as King Solomon's Temple, was built in the 9th century BCE. The Babylonians destroyed it in 586 BCE. The rock inside the Dome of the Rock is also believed by Jews to be the site where God instructed Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac.

The Second Temple was built around 536 BCE and destroyed in 70 AD.

According to the Bible, the Temple Mount is also the site of a future Third Temple.

Real-life events the backdrop for study of anti-Semitism

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Review

The Second Catastrophe, the first full-length novel by Howard Rotberg, is actually two books in one – the first is narrative fiction, while the second is a well-researched historical account of issues facing Israel and the Jewish people.

Rotberg was born and raised in Brantford, Ont., and has degrees in both history and law from the University of Toronto. He practised corporate law for 20 years in Kitchener, but sold his law practice in 1997 to focus on writing and land development. He has written for a number of newspapers and magazines.

Rotberg's main character, widower Norman Rosenfeld, is a cultural historian at a small Canadian university. He is also an Orthodox Jew.

The professor is in the midst of writing a controversial book about Israel and the Jewish people when he learns that his daughter, who is in a one-year program at Hebrew University, has been injured by a Palestinian terrorist attack at a restaurant in Jerusalem at the height of the second intifadah.

He rushes to Israel with his father, a Holocaust survivor named Lucky, who, despite the horrors he experienced during the war, is a perpetual optimist.

In Israel, Rosenfeld meets and falls in love with a secular Israeli doctor.

The Second Catastrophe
Howard Rotberg

Using the fictional story as a backdrop, Rotberg intersperses passages from the professor's non-fiction work, titled The Second Holocaust: Radical Islamism, Western Complicity, and the Israeli Political/Cultural Response, throughout the novel.

The excerpts, based on actual historic information, examine such subjects as the history of the Holocaust, anti-Semitism, the nature of Islam, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, convicted spy Jonathan Pollard, Jewish anti-Zionism and Sept. 11.

Rotberg's book contains a number of interwoven themes.

In addition to confronting contemporary issues in his own book and in his life, Rosenfeld, as the son of a Holocaust survivor, also tries to deal with his feelings of despair about what happened to Jews in the Shoah.

We learn that as a teenager, Rosenfeld studied the Torah and other religious writings to try to come to terms with God's role in human history and how a just and merciful deity could allow the suffering of innocent Jews.

Rotberg also uses Rosenfeld to examine the ideological assault on Israel by extremist Arab leaders, European countries, the United Nations and the media, and he draws a parallel between the events of the 1930s and the current situation.

The reader is left to decide if these parallels and Rosenfeld's perceptions are valid. But whether one agrees with his thesis or not, the fictional professor sounds a profound and striking note of alarm.

He draws a direct line from the Wannsee Conference, as the beginning of the Holocaust, to the United Nations' 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, and finally to what he calls "the second Holocaust."

Militant Islam, the professor writes, is a complete revolt against western enlightenment, just as Nazism was a revolt against the Ten Commandments as bequeathed by the Jews to the western world. The Jews, Rosenfeld contends, were to be punished as the proponents of these values.

The reader can see from the professor's fictional background why he would take such a pessimistic view of world events.

In quoting research done by the professor, Rotberg quotes philosophers, politicians, historians, journalists and others who warn that to minimize the threat to the Jews is not an option, as it could lead to the destruction of the Jewish people.

Through his protagonist, Rotberg argues that the Arabs' genocidal goal is the removal of the Jewish presence from what they perceive to be Muslim territory – despite their rhetoric for western consumption.

Along with the author's compelling arguments, the relationships in the novel force the readers to assess for themselves the challenges faced by Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora.

Rotberg has done his research and added human emotions and frailties so that readers are both moved by the drama and informed by his global perspective.

The Second Catastrophe (Mantua Books) was launched recently at Israel's The Judaica Centre and is available at bookstores across the country.

Maimonides' legacy lives on 800 years later

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It has been nearly 800 years since the death of Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon, the revered philosopher, physician and religious leader, but his legacy lives on.

At a recent lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue called "Maimonides: The Man, His Philosophy and His Impact On Judaism," Prof. Menachem Ben Sasson of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem shed light on the towering figure.

Born in Cordoba, Spain in 1135, Maimonides was the scion of a scholarly family.

In his early years, Cordoba's Jewish population underwent upheaval as the Almohades, a fanatical Muslim group, conquered the city.

"They didn't tolerate any other alternative in religion," Ben Sasson said. "Most of the community converted [although] it was a fake conversion."

Rather than renounce their faith, Maimonides and his family fled the area, eventually settling in Fez, Morocco, where he began his studies.

But Almohades' tyrannical reign eventually reached Morocco and the family once again fled, first to the Holy Land and then to Egypt.

These experiences likely moulded Maimonides' relatively progressive views on the Crypto-Jews who practised in private, Ben Sasson said.

At the time, a letter circulated in the Jewish community warning Crypto-Jews that they risked expulsion from their own community for their apparent change of faith. But Maimonides, a rational thinker influenced deeply by Aristotle, felt differently.

"Maimonides wanted the Crypto- Jews to continue whatever they could," Ben Sasson said.

"If Jews happen to reside in a place where there are decrees against them to give their lives, they must flee to another place," Maimonides wrote in his Igeret Hashemad (Letter on Forced Conversion), arguing that Crypto-Jews were still considered Jews and should not despair despite their plight.

Maimonides lived in Egypt from 1166 until his death, writing many famed works, including a 14-volume Mishnah Torah or Code of Jewish Law, as well as commentary on the Mishnah and the Guide to the Perplexed.

While devoutly observant, Maimonides did not believe in blind faith and was well-read in secular philosophy.

As a result, he deeply opposed the influence in Cairo of the Karaites, a radical Jewish sect who believed Scripture should be taken literally.

He helped to steer the community away from the Karaites and soon became a prominent political figure.

"He became head of the Jews in less than six years," Ben Sasson said, noting that Maimonides' influence as leader of the Jewish community stretched to Syria, Lebanon, Israel and Yemen.

In fact, he intervened with government officials in Yemen in 1172 when the Jewish community was under threat of forced conversion.

Maimonides was able to devote his days to Torah partly as a result of the financial support he received from his brother David, a successful merchant.

But when David died, Maimonides had to find a means to support himself and his wife and son. He decided to study medicine, excelling in it as he did with his intellectual pursuits. He wrote 15 treatises on the theory and practice of medicine and became a physician in the Sultan's court.

Maimonides died in 1204 and was buried in Tiberias.

"It's quite [amazing] that Maimonides is still at the heart of not only Jewish, but modern consciousness," Ben Sasson said.

Several additional lectures on Maimonides are scheduled over the next three months at Beth Tikvah, including one by Rabbi Wayne Allen called "Why Do Bad Things Happen To Good People," on Jan. 19 at 8 p.m.

Financial needs of disabled persons explored

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Planning for the financial needs of a person with developmental disabilities can be a challenging responsibility for families.

At a recent information session hosted by the Reena Foundation, parents had some of their questions answered by a panel of experts.

Natalie Hennessey of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, spoke about the Ontario Disability Support Program (ODSP), which provides financial assistance to developmentally disabled persons 18 years of age or over.

ODSP applicants receive assistance based primarily on their financial status.

For instance, if a single person has more than $5,000 in cash, RRSPs or insurance policies, he or she will not qualify for the program.

The amounts of assistance vary. Hennessey said single persons who rent their dwelling could receive up to $930 per month from ODSP, which is not considered taxable income.

Parents and advocates have long complained about the financial limitations of the program.

Rachel Blumenfeld, a tax and trusts lawyer with Miller Thomson, discussed an increasingly popular method to avoid the asset limit roadblock known as discretionary trusts.

These trusts, also commonly referred to as Henson Trusts, are not considered an asset, regardless of the amount they hold.

"Hensons are designed specifically for disabled people who are receiving benefits," Blumenfeld said.

They involve "transferring assets from yourself to a trustee who holds the assets on behalf of the beneficiaries and uses them for the benefit of the beneficiaries."

The most common way a Henson Trust is established is in the parents' or caregiver's will.

Funds in the trust can be from savings, a parent's estate, money from other family members or life insurance, and large lump sums can be left in the trust.

While the trustee is entitled to compensation – 2.5 per cent of the money that goes into the estate and 2.5 per cent of what goes out – Blumenfeld said trustees usually do not opt for the compensation because it is taxable.

There are certain stipulations regarding how the money from the Henson Trust is spent.

For example, as long as the money is used for "disability-related items, services, education or training expenses that are not reimbursable," they are exempt as income.

Up to $4,000 in a 12-month period can be used for any purpose and still be exempt as income. And in the first month that money is placed in the trust as a provision of a will, the money is also exempt.

Another possibility for helping the person with the disability is through charitable gifts, which can also have a connection to a Henson Trust.

Through a Charitable Remainder Trust, a sum of money can be deposited into the Henson Trust for the disabled person, the donor is provided with tax relief and money is given to a charitable organization after the death of the person the trust was used for.

Reena Foundation chair Frank Simkevitz said parents may want to provide donations to the organization(s) that helped their children and the Henson Trust could be established to do that.

"The reason why it's important [to donate] is to ensure the work an organization like Reena does will continue… to serve the children of other parents," Simkevitz said.

Bikathon participant travels off-beaten path to Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Eric Kaminsky in Israel on the Alyn Hospital's Wheels of Love bike ride.

Torontonian Eric Kaminsky is one of 160 bicycle riders from around the world who recently completed a five-day, 350-kilometre ride throughout Israel to raise money for Israel's only pediatric and adolescent rehabilitation centre.

Wheels of Love is an annual charity bike ride for Alyn Hospital, a non-profit hospital located in the Kiryat Hayovel neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The event, which took place early last month, included male and female participants ages 15 to 75, and raised $1.3 million for the hospital, which cares for physically disabled children and adolescents regardless of religious or ethnic background.

Kaminsky, 45, speaks enthusiastically of the bike ride, which began in northern Israel, just south of the Lebanese border at Ma'alot, and continued through Shlomi, Safed, Ramat Hashofet, Nashsolim and Yad Benyamin to Jerusalem.

"Although the ride is challenging, even the more novice riders were able to garner the strength to complete every part of the ride," Kaminsky said. "At every corner and every hill, there was a new, fantastic view. We travelled mostly off the main roads to the corners of the country that most tourists never see."

Kaminsky, who has been riding since he was a child and now rides about 200 kilometres a week, said in Jerusalem, the riders assembled at the top of the mountain and rode the last five kilometres to Alyn Hospital, where they celebrated with their family members and patients and their families.

Kaminsky, co-owner/operator of Canadian Iron and Metal with his brothers Arthur and Steven, went to Israel when he graduated from William Lyon Mackenzie Secondary School and spent almost a year working on a kibbutz. He returned to Toronto, completed his studies at York University and spent several years travelling and working throughout the world.

The father of two, Kaminsky said he had "strong feelings to support Israel at this difficult time. I spoke to my wife Sheera and we decided to take all our family summer vacations with the children in Israel instead of somewhere else."

This summer, the family toured Alyn Hospital.

"I was so impressed with the individual attention they give each child and the amount of love combined with expert care," he said. "They [have] so many innovative [ideas] in treating children who are victims of terrorist attacks and those with deficiencies resulting from congenital or inherited diseases as well as other injuries."

Riders on Wheels of Love pay their own way and expenses, Kaminsky said. He set his fundraising goal at $4,000.

"I anticipated that the response to my fundraising would not be strong since there are so many demands… but there was a tremendous response and I was able to raise more than $9,000," he said.

Kaminsky said he felt safe throughout the five-day trip.

"Throughout the entire ride, there was no feeling that you were in a country at war. We were more concerned of the danger posed by cars than terrorists," he said.

"The media is trying to make people feel that visiting Israel is like walking through a mine field but the reality is completely different. I actually felt safer there than I do in many areas of Toronto," he said.

"I hope to do the Alyn ride again next year."

For more information on Alyn Hospital and Wheels of Love, visit www.alyn.org or call Kaminsky at 416-762-7351.

Book blows the whistle on Mordechai Vanunu

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Oct. 5, 1986, the Sunday Times of London published a story on its front page about Israel's secret nuclear program. The source of the newspaper's scoop was Mordechai Vanunu, a disaffected former technician at Israel's nuclear research centre in Dimona.

By going public with this explosive data, Vanunu confirmed the widespread suspicion that Israel, its heated denials notwithstanding, was in fact a nuclear power, the sixth after the United States, the Soviet Union, China, France and Britain. (Since then, India and Pakistan have joined this exclusive club.)

Mordechai Vanunu

None too pleased by his astonishing revelation, Israel, through a blonde, shapely Mossad spy, lured Vanunu from his new home in London to Rome. There he was drugged, whisked back to Israel, charged with espionage and treason, tried behind closed doors and sentenced to 18 years imprisonment. He is due to be released in April 2004.

Yoel Cohen's book, The Whistleblower of Dimona: Israel, Vanunu and the Bomb (Holmes &Meier), is a comprehensive account of Vanunu's caper, his trial and Israel's nuclear arsenal.

Israel went nuclear thanks in large part to France. In 1956, France agreed to supply Israel with a plutonium-producing reactor. Israel reportedly obtained the primary raw materials for an atomic bomb – uranium and heavy water – from Argentina, Central African Republic, Gabon, Niger, Norway and the United States.

Although Israel has never admitted to possessing nuclear weapons, it has dropped tantalizing hints that it is quite capable of building them. Israel's posture of ambiguity was formalized in 1969 when the prime minister, Golda Meir, promised Richard Nixon, the U.S. president, that Israel would neither publicly acknowledge its nuclear program nor conduct nuclear tests.

Vanunu, who was born in Morocco in 1954, immigrated to Israel with his family in 1963. He began working at the nuclear research centre in 1977, when he was a follower of Menachem Begin, the first Likud prime minister. Politically, Vanunu turned leftwards after Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

It would not be his sole conversion. Later, he converted to Christianity.

While working at the centre, he studied philosophy at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. As a result of his studies, Cohen claims, Vanunu became increasingly troubled by the "ethical dilemmas" of nuclear weaponry.

But, as Cohen also suggests, Vanunu was a disgruntled worker, convinced that his lack of advancement was a function of his Sephardi background.

In 1986, he left Israel, bound for southeast Asia and Australia. In Sydney, he fell in with a group of Protestant church clerics critical of nuclear weapons. Before long, he was baptized, and adopted the name John Crossman.

Vanunu, having already taken photographs of the Israeli nuclear research centre where he had been employed, sold them to the Sunday Times, which specialized in splashy exposes.

The Sunday Times estimated that Israel had up to 200 nuclear warheads. Israel, while denying the validity of the story, took steps to capture Vanunu.

Cohen, a British-born Israeli writer, describes the cloak-and-dagger operation Israel mounted to bring Vanunu to justice, as well as his trial.

For the first 12 years of his incarceration, Vanunu was held in solitary confinement in an isolated cell of Ashkelon Prison. He spent much of his day reading classic literary works.

The only people he was allowed to see were his family and a priest. In 1998, he was permitted to mix with the rest of the prisoners.

Vanunu has no regrets, according to Cohen. In a 1999 letter, he wrote, "My inner conviction is strong that what I did was right."

Cohen claims that Vanunu's disclosure had a beneficial effect, in that it raised Israel's nuclear deterrence posture against Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War.

Knowing full well that Israel was a nuclear state, Iraq refrained from deploying non-conventional warheads on the 39 Scud missiles it fired into Israel.

"Baghdad correctly calculated that Israel would not respond with a nuclear attack as long as Iraq did not cross the threshold from conventional weapons to non-conventional arms," he writes.

This is conjecture, but interesting nevertheless.

The Jewish Education Report

by Suzanne Wintrob

When Teachers Go to School

This year's Professional Development days, organized by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education covered a lot of ground – both theoretically and physically, for over 1,200 teachers. For one thing, it offered them the opportunity to secure Professional Learning Program credit with the Ontario College of Teachers.

For the first time, the day school sessions were held at four Thornhill locations - Associated Hebrew Schools, Eitz Chaim Schools, Leo Baeck Day School and Netivot Hatorah Day School. Holy Blossom Temple hosted the supplementary school sessions.

Among the PD day highlights were:

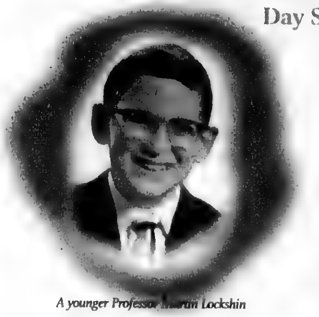
- The Zionist Seminars, featuring Israeli young people who have a fresh approach to making Israel come alive in the classroom. Their sessions were full of hands-on ideas about the holidays, Israeli culture and how to deal with the dilemmas facing Israel.
- Strategies for teachers to deal with issues such as classroom management, bullying and brain learning.

Of special note at the day school PD day was Judaism 101 – a basic course for general studies teachers, taught by Dr. Seymour Epstein (Epi), BJE's Executive Director and UJA Federation's Vice President of Education. The session, which attempted to provide answers to "everything you always wanted to know about Judaism but were afraid to ask," included another first – a video-conferencing setup with Neil Lazarus in Israel.

This year's PD days also benefited from the fact that Hebrew University was holding its conference in Toronto at the same time. Two Hebrew U. professors – Howard Deitcher and Sidra DeKoven Ezrahi – presented sessions on Bible and literature. Rabbi Aharon Fried, Associate Professor of Psychology and Education at Stern College of Yeshiva University, delivered a well-attended session on special education.

Where are They Now?

Day School Determined his Calling: Professor Martin Lockshin



A younger Professor Martin Lockshin

The day Martin Lockshin took an entrance exam at Yeshivat Merkaz HaRav Kook in Israel, he realized just how valuable his day school education had been.

It was the early 1970s and young Martin had just finished up a year of study at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. He was hoping to spend the next four years attending the Jerusalem-based yeshiva and knew both the exam and personal interview could make or break his plans.

"I remember how scared I was when I went for that test," he recalls. "But then I saw the big smile on the rabbi's face when I was able to answer all of his questions. He figured, 'This guy is coming from Canada, what could he know?'"

So began Lockshin's long career in Jewish studies. Following four years of Torah study in Israel, where he received his rabbinical ordination, he headed off to New York for his B.A. from Touro College. Then it was Brandeis University in Massachusetts, where he earned Masters and PhD degrees. Today Lockshin is director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

"The two greatest things I got from day school were Hebrew language and Bible training," says Lockshin, 52. "I walked into Israel right after finishing Grade 13 and was able to read the newspaper, listen to the radio, qualify to take university courses with Israelis, and study at one of the best yeshivot in Israel. And when I was 18 years old in the Bible department at Hebrew U, I knew the Bible at least as well as the Israeli students did."

Lockshin started his formal Jewish education as part of the first-ever United Synagogue Day School class, known back then as the Foundation School. But the class was disbanded at the end of Grade 2 because there weren't enough kids to keep it going, he says, and so his parents moved him to Associated Hebrew School. He graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) in 1969 and is still in touch with many of his 17 classmates.

Perhaps it's because he's an educator himself that some of Lockshin's fondest memories are of the day school teachers who helped shape his life. He was particularly impressed by his high school principal, the late Jack Burke, who managed to do the impossible – give students a love of Hebrew grammar.

"Dikduk is something people love to hate," says Lockshin. "Mr. Burke made it fun. He made it intellectually exciting. He had brilliance, and the greatest gift he gave me was that I left Associated and CHAT and knew Hebrew so well. It's the same with my own kids now – the teachers who have an effect on them are characters who do something unusual."

Lockshin's four children have all gone through the day school system, and for good reason.

"I want them to have the skills of knowing the great classics of Jewish tradition," he explains. "I'd be very disappointed if I sent them to a school where they didn't learn Hamlet and Macbeth, but we Jews have other great books like Genesis and Judges and our kids won't be exposed to those if they don't go to an intensive Jewish school. These texts are best understood if they're read in the original, not in translation, and that's hard to do without a day school education."

The Little School That Grew

Beit Sefer Solel, a Mississauga supplementary school, began back in 1973, when a handful of families decided they'd had enough of bustling Toronto and headed for the suburbs. They chose sprawling Mississauga as their new home and soon, longing for Jewish communal life, they started a Reform synagogue called Solel Congregation and then brought their children together to learn as a group.

Move ahead 30 years and Beit Sefer Solel's halls now resonate with the laughter of 230 children, who flock to class on weekends or after public school to learn about their heritage. Many come with their parents in tow because of Beit Sefer Solel's unique approach to learning: parents and school graduates make up the school's entire faculty.

"We took as our motto 'V'shinantam Le'vanecha – And you shall teach your children diligently' and so our students have always been taught by parents," explains Arliene Botnick, the school's Director of Education for the past 17 years. "We now run our own teacher training program to encourage and to train other congregants in the tradition of teaching our own children, and today our entire staff, except for one person, is made up of members of the congregation. And Rabbi Lawrence Englander is an integral part of the school, teaching every Sunday."

Every Sunday, children in nursery through Grade 10 come to school for three hours of Jewish learning, with Grades 4 through 8 attending on Tuesday evenings as well. Curriculum guidelines follow those set out by the Reform movement, with the early years immersed in Jewish identity, the Jewish world, and Biblical and modern heroes, and then progressing to in-depth looks at Israel, Torah and Mishna, world religions, the Holocaust, and much more. Sometimes the students take trips into the big city to study the wider Jewish and secular community. They learn conversational Hebrew, put on plays, volunteer at food banks, raise money for various causes, and organize synagogue events. Adult classes in Torah, Hebrew or other subjects take place on Sundays, too, so entire families can be learning in the same setting.

Togetherness is also a feature of Shabbat, with every grade given an opportunity to lead part or all of the synagogue services. The junior grades often get together on Shabbat afternoons for themed programs complete with stories, activities and crafts. Graduation takes place after Grade 10, with this year's confirmation class set to go on a weekend retreat to Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati "to get a real sense of the depth of our faith," says Botnick.

Given such a positive learning experience, it's no wonder many students return to the school after confirmation to become teachers themselves. Even though the 40 adults and 25 teenagers on staff are compensated by honourarium rather than by salary, it's a strong sense of family, she says, that keeps them coming back year after year.

"We've created a miracle out here," says Botnick, who is grateful to family education grants from UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education for making much of Beit Sefer Solel's programming possible.

Beit Sefer Solel will be holding a Chanukah Bash on Sunday, December 21 from 2 to 4 p.m., complete with wandering minstrels, clowns, magicians, arts and crafts, singing and great food. The entire community is invited. The school, situated in the synagogue, is located at 2399 Folkway Drive in Mississauga. For details or directions call 905-820-5915.

Jewish Education On the Move

Fighting for Education Justice

Now that Ontario's new Liberal government is repealing education tax credits retroactive to the beginning of this year for those who send their children to Jewish day schools, the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), affiliated with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, is working feverishly to win a change of heart.

"Faith-based schools are entitled to the same rights as Catholic schools," says OAJDS co-president Aaron Blumenfeld. "Our parents came into the school year with the understanding that their tax credit was coming through, and since the change in government we've received dozens of letters, some of which are really heart wrenching, from parents."

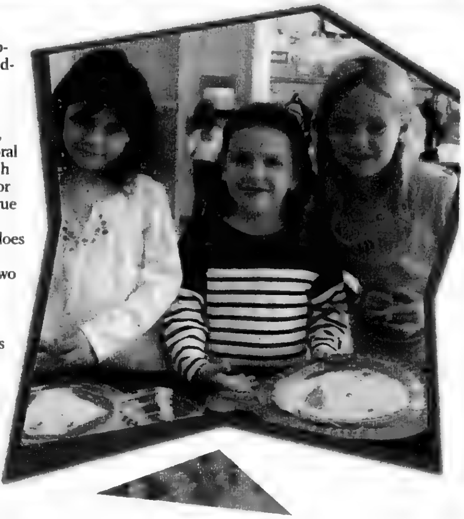
In mid-November, OAJDS representatives met face-to-face with government officials to spell out what it feels is a fair compromise. The group offered two concrete suggestions. First, if the tax credits must be repealed, then the government should wait until the end of the current school year to do so, since many parents have committed their tuition dollars based on receiving a refund of up to $1,400 per child. And if repealing it is the government's final decision, OAJDS added, an alternative should be put in place first. The government adopted neither recommendation.

According to OAJDS, approximately 40% of parents in the Jewish day school system cannot afford full tuition and rely on subsidies from UJA Federation and the schools themselves. Since parents made the decision to send their children to an independent school well before the provincial election, argues OAJDS, they budgeted accordingly and, in many cases, paid for tuition before school started or provided post-dated cheques to the school that would be withdrawn over the school year. Consequently, canceling the Equity in Education Tax Credit retroactively could force some parents to remove their children from independent schools and place them in the public school system. Losing students in the middle of the year, says OAJDS, would put enormous strain on day school budgets and added pressure on the public school system due to sudden increased enrollment.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, Executive Director of the Board of Jewish Education, calls the whole issue "a moral stain on our province which can neither be tolerated nor justified." If Ontario is a true mosaic of every culture imaginable, he asks, "why does the public school system still represent just two dominant cultures?"

OAJDS is encouraging parents to contact their government representatives to share their personal stories.

For more information contact OAJDS at 416-636-1647 or oajds@canada.com.



Council Unites Young Jews

If you're a Jewish child, teenager or university student living in Toronto and you're looking to meet people who think like you do, chances are there's a youth group that will fit the bill.

Each and every day, hundreds of Toronto kids head to their nearest synagogue or local meeting place to take part in a multitude of activities that unite Jewish youth for fun and learning. Many groups organize conferences and retreats on weekends or school holidays and some also run summer camps when school is out.

But while many of the groups may differ in religious practice or political leaning, what makes them similar is their commitment to Israel, the Jewish people and the community at large.

"Ask any parent what was the most meaningful Jewish experience they had in their childhood and they would probably say it was what they learned outside of the classroom," says Channa Pinchasi, the Jewish Agency's representative in Toronto responsible for Israel Affairs and coordinator of the UJA Board of Jewish Education Youth Council. "There's so much to be gained from informal education, and that's why youth movements play such a pivotal role in the community."

Eight youth movements belong to the BJE's Youth Council, with representatives coming together once a month to discuss common issues, share successful programming ideas and plan joint activities.

They're certainly diverse in those to whom they cater and what they stand for. Bnei Akiva, for example, an Orthodox movement that's devoted to Torah and Aliyah, runs Shabbat afternoon programs, Shabbatonim, and a host of other activities throughout the year for Grades 3 through high school. BBYO isn't affiliated with any synagogue or political party but gears its year-round programs for Grades 7 and up. Habonim Dror, allied with Israel's Labour Party, runs programs for Grades 2 through 12 with a strong socialist kibbutz feel. Everyone from kids to counselors votes on potential activities. Hashomer Hatzair, an extension of Israel's left-wing Meretz party, which runs activities every two weeks at its uptown and downtown meeting places, promotes themes of sharing and togetherness.

United Synagogue Youth (USY), geared to high school kids, runs 11 chapters out of local Conservative synagogues in Ontario and Quebec. Later this month, some 1,500 USYers will converge on a downtown Toronto hotel for the organization's international convention, the first time it's ever been held here. There's also the North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY), whose North East Lakes region runs social, social action and study programs for high school students at five Reform synagogues in Toronto. Canadian Young Judea, designed for 8- to 18-year-olds, calls itself pluralistic and apolitical and boasts 1,000 Toronto members who come out to Shabbat programs in addition to other social and social action activities.

And then there's Betar-Tagar, with a more right-wing orientation, directed solely at university students of all backgrounds who want to be active and vocal in supporting Israel on campus. Students recently picketed the CBC building to protest biased reporting, paraded at an Israel solidarity march in New York City, and met with Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on his recent visit to Toronto.

York University student Aliza Jesin, Regional Director of Bnei Akiva, finds great merit in belonging to a youth group.

"It's important to meet people from all sorts of backgrounds and all sorts of ideologies, but it's just as important to build a social group, a network, a support group of people your age who believe in the same things you do, who can support you and help you through hard times."

Tamara Kochberg, Regional Youth Director of USY's Eastern Canadian Region, says uniting kids of different backgrounds for joint programming helps them realize there are others just like them who are equally committed to being Jewish.

"As part of the Youth Council, they can learn that there are so many different ways to express their Judaism," she says. "For some people it involves religion and for some it doesn't. For some it involves a strong display of Zionism and for some it doesn't. But the bottom line is they're all Jewish teens living in the Greater Toronto Area, and when they come together as a body there's something quite significant about their passion for who they are."

York student president-elect denies wrongdoing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cooper's campaign plagued by number of incidents

A nine-hour elections committee hearing was held last Thursday at York University after complaints about campaign spending by the Hillel-endorsed student government slate that swept the York Federation of Students (YFS) elections.

The decision was expected to be released Monday afternoon, just after The CJN's press time.

Paul Cooper headed the 31-member Progress Not Politics (PNP) slate, which won 27 seats, including all four executive positions. Results were announced two weeks ago, but are not official until they are ratified by the YFS council. Ratification is expected to take place Dec. 15, providing there are no outstanding complaints, according to Michael Novak, the current YFS president who Cooper would be replacing.

Cooper's campaign was plagued by incidents, including the disqualification of a council candidate who slandered the PNP slate – the first-ever student government to be endorsed by the university's Hillel – at a Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights event.

Three candidates filed complaints before the election was over, alleging that prices for Cooper's campaign flyers and posters did not represent fair market value, based on their own costs and inquiries as well as on a candidates' meeting that addressed the issue of fair market value.

"We worked hard to get the price we got," said Cooper at the hearing. "What we did was not based on some special privilege. It was based on negotiating."

Candidates for executive positions were restricted to a maximum of $400 for their campaigns, while students running for councillors' positions had a limit of $100. Cooper's expenditures totalled $351.38, including $56 plus tax ($64.40) for 4,000 brochures.

Cooper produced a letter from Jack Oziel, CEO of Continental Press, outlining seven cost-cutting measures that were used for the printing job. Among them, the paper used was "end-of-line stock of the lowest-quality house brand." Also, some fees were eliminated by using equipment that didn't require film, by running the order with another job and by not "bundling" the order into smaller quantities.

Cooper also presented three quotes from other printing companies that were "still within the ballpark of what we paid." The highest was $82.80 (including tax). He also said the salesperson at Continental, Judy Roth, was no relation to Ya'akov Roth, his campaign manager and main negotiator with the printing company.

"The price given for the order as above would have been available to anyone attempting to make the same order at the same time," wrote Oziel.

Complainants Erica-Joy Henry, who also ran for president (she came in third) and Pablo Vivanco, who ran for vice-president academic, cited quotes as high as $520 just for flyers, but Edward Prutschi, legal counsel to Cooper's slate, said they were comparing "apples and broccoli" because their specifications were not the same.

He said Cooper's slate "did everything a smart election campaign should do to save costs and stay within the rules."

Prutschi also expressed serious reservations about the appropriateness of a YFS committee to determine the matter. The committee, four of whose five members were present, was chaired by Novak.

It's "inherently improper," Prutschi told The CJN.

The YFS' chief returning officer, Ryan Jarvis, to whom the complaints were made, said he didn't believe the evidence was strong enough to remove the PNP candidates from the election, but he believed the investigation was necessary.

He also said during the hearing he didn't believe there was malicious intent on the part of Cooper or his slate.

"They've done a pretty stand-up job."

Toward the end of the day, after most of the evidence had been presented, Jarvis referred to the candidates' meeting at which fair market value had been discussed. "We did mention that five cents was the norm for most photocopies… We didn't think [a price as low as one cent] was viable, but maybe it is all of a sudden." Cooper's costs worked out to 1.6 cents per page.

Cooper, who won the election by 139 votes, asked in his closing statement whether it would make sense – even if the committee rejects his evidence – to disqualify 19 candidates elected by clear majorities.

"Would you run over the will of the very students who… have spoken loud and clear?"

The Jewish Kitchen tells the story of past Jewish life

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

An Auschwitz survivor, only one of four, returns to his Norwegian town to rebuild a Jewish community. A group of Spanish Jews, fleeing the Inquisition, cross the savage seas to Curacao and establish the oldest synagogue in continuous use in the New World. The tiny, but active, Jewish community of Salonika rebuilds itself on the ashen remains of what once was a 2,000-year-old thriving metropolis of Jewish culture.

Clarissa Hyman's beautifully photographed new cookbook, The Jewish Kitchen, is alive with miracles – stories of remnants of Jewish life, war-torn Jewish communities, displaced and rebuilding, bringing with them their glorious history, rich culture and a cuisine passed through the generations, itself a story of miraculous survival.

This award-winning author criss-crossed the globe, visiting eight families in nine months, recording their stories, their recipes, even taking some of the location photographs herself. The rest she filled in through the miracle of e-mail, which is how I interviewed her from her home in Manchester, England.

"The stories were as important to me as the recipes, because I believe in context and background, and I wanted to give snapshots of the Jewish world today to show that there are so many different aspects to the Jewish experience. Sadly, time and budget put limits on my voyage around the Jewish world, which is why e-mail is so wonderful. It's been an unexpected bonus, making friends around the world."

Hyman's nine months of work on the book – "research, travelling, writing, testing, a miracle in itself!" – started at the beginning of the year and ended just after Simchat Torah. Rosh Hashanah she spent in Trondheim.

"Here was this tiny community that by all rights should not exist at all and that has been almost completely brought back to life after the Holocaust by one Auschwitz survivor, Julius Paltiel, who invited me to share the holiday with his family."

In Antwerp, Leila Rubens organized a lunch for 16 Jewish women from different countries. "Each arrived with a special family dish that none of her friends had ever sampled before. By the end of lunch, everyone was swopping recipes, most of them included in the book. I didn't dare leave anyone out! It really brought the essence of the Jewish kitchen alive for me."

By Chanukah, a favourite festival rich with childhood memories, she was home in Manchester. "I was the only child, so I always got to light the candles with the shammas and would sing, badly, Ma'oz Tzur to my proud parents and would get the first latke out of the pan."

In fact, Manchester is the ninth spot on the tour, where Hyman recounts the miracle of her own family. Her grandfather survived the sinking of the Titanic and returned to Manchester to open a kosher deli called Titanics, where Hyman grew up. "I was raised in a pickle barrel," she says her mother would say of her.

Chanukah Foods

No Jewish cookbook would be complete without latkes, and Hyman's recipe is her own. But Chanukah is about the oil, not the potato! Jews the world over also celebrate with doughnuts and fritters. Hyman tells of Moroccan and Turkish Jews who feast on special meals on the sixth and last nights of Chanukah, and of Russian Jews who used to celebrate a flaming tea ceremony in which sugar cubes were dipped in brandy, placed on spoons and lit with candles.

For a change from latkes, Tunisian briks, when fried, are perfectly appropriate for the holiday. They recall a community that shrank from 80,000 in 1948, Hyman observes, to about 2,000 today, as Tunisians immigrated, mostly to Israel and France.

From the Israeli food and wine writer Daniel Rogov come pineapple fritters, a classic for Chanukah in Lyon, France, where owner Celestine Benditte-Strauss served them at her renowned Restaurant Cercle.

Rugelach for Chanukah? Hyman describes the lesser known Chanukah tradition of eating cheese and dairy products in memory of Judith, a brave Jewish widow who beheaded the enemy General Holofernes after feeding him – what? Hyman says "fatal small cakes." Some say perhaps she got him thirsty on cheese so he would drink wine and fall asleep. Others insist it was rich, creamy food for the same reason. While stories differ, the message is clear.

"One Jewish dish, 20 different versions. One Jewish story, 20 different tales. I doubt if there can ever be one single, definitive explanation in Jewish lore. Regardless, Judith's bravery was said to have inspired Judas Maccabee. Who knows? I think it's more a case of parallel stories coming together. It's one of the wonderful things about Jewish food: We are as lavish with our symbolism and myths as we are with the sour cream. Any excuse for something delicious to eat!"

TUNISIAN BRIK WITH TUNA AND POTATOES

1 small onion, finely chopped
vegetable oil, for frying
$3\frac{1}{2}$ oz. canned tuna in olive oil, drained and crumbled
3 potatoes, peeled and boiled
1 egg, beaten
1 oz. parsley, finely chopped
1 tbsp. capers
$\frac{1}{2}$ tsp. turmeric pinch of harissa (or more to taste)
salt and pepper
16 sheets phyllo pastry or 8 sheets brik pastry

Lightly fry the onion in a little oil and let cool. Mash the tuna and potatoes with the rest of the ingredients except the pastry and oil and set aside. Cut the phyllo pastry into 6-inch squares. Brush a pastry square with oil, then place another phyllo square on top – you need 2 layers for each brik unless using special brik pastry.

Place a large tablespoon of filling in the centre, then fold to make an oblong or triangular shape. Moisten the edges with water to seal the pastry. Deep-fry for a minute at 375 until golden brown, turning if not completely submerged in the oil, then drain on paper towel. Serves 8.

PINEAPPLE FRITTERS À LA CÉLESTINE

2 large pineapples, peeled, cored and thickly sliced superfine granulated sugar, for dredging
$\frac{1}{4}$ cup Kirsch
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 cup warm water
$\frac{7}{8}$ cup beer
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tbsp. brandy
pinch of salt
2 egg whites, whisked apricot jam, for spreading vegetable oil, for deep-frying superfine granulated sugar, for sprinkling

Dredge the pineapple with sugar, then sprinkle generously with the Kirsch. Let steep 30-40 minutes.

Sift the flour and mix with the water, beer, oil, brandy and salt to make a batter. Dry the pineapple slices on paper towel, then coat them with a thin layer of apricot jam.

While the oil is heating, fold the whisked egg whites into the batter. Take the fruit and batter to the stove. When the oil is hot (350 degrees), dip the pineapple slices into the batter, then fry until golden brown on both sides. Serve hot, sprinkled with sugar, if desired. Serves 6-8.

HAZELNUT RUGELACH

13 tbsp. butter, softened
7 oz. cream cheese
2 tsp. superfine granulated sugar
2 cups all-purpose flour, sifted with a pinch of salt
¼ cup brown sugar
4 tbsp. cocoa powder
2 tsp. cinnamon
⅞ cup finely chopped hazelnuts (or walnuts)
2 tbsp. butter, melted
1 egg white beaten with a little water
granulated sugar (optional)

Cream the butter and cheese until well blended. Stir in the superfine sugar, then the flour and mix until the dough begins to hold together. Gather into a ball, wrap in plastic wrap and chill overnight.

Preheat oven to 350. Combine the brown sugar, cocoa, cinnamon and nuts and set aside. Cut the dough ball in half and return one half to the fridge while you work with the other. On a lightly floured surface, roll out the pastry into a thin circle about 10 in. in diameter. The pastry may feel hard at first, but it quickly softens. Use a cake pan or plate to help cut out a neat circle. Cut the dough circle into 16 or 8 equal pie-shaped wedges.

Brush the surface of the wedges with melted butter, then sprinkle evenly with half the nut mixture. Cover with a piece of plastic wrap and use a rolling pin to press the filing lightly down into the dough.

Remove the plastic wrap and roll up each wedge from the outside, wide end toward the point, so you end up with mini croissants. Place on a lightly greased baking sheet and brush with the beaten egg white. Sprinkle with a little sugar, if desired. Repeat with the remaining dough and bake for 20-30 minutes until golden brown. Let cool slightly before transferring to a wire cooling rack. Makes 32 small or 16 large.

OMISSION

In the story titled "Food as visual art" (CJN, Nov. 20), the following recipe was omitted:

TOMATO, BRIE AND ONION STRUDEL

1 tbsp. olive or canola oil
1 onion, sliced
1 tsp. sugar
½ package frozen puff pastry, thawed
2 tsp. Dijon mustard
4 oz. brie, thinly sliced sliced tomatoes, as needed fresh rosemary
1 egg, beaten

Preheat oven to 450. In large skillet, heat oil over medium heat. Cook onion and sugar, stirring occasionally, until onion is golden and softened, about 20 minutes. Set aside to cool.

On lightly floured surface, roll out puff pastry into 12x9-inch rectangle. Spread mustard lengthwise along middle third of pastry. Spoon onion mixture over mustard. Top with sliced cheese, then tomatoes. Sprinkle with fresh rosemary.

Starting at corner of 1 long edge of pastry, make diagonal cuts, 1 inch apart almost to filling. Repeat on other side in opposite direction. Alternating strips from side to side, fold over filling to resemble a braid, brushing each strip with some of the egg to secure. Transfer to parchment-lined baking sheet. Bake for about 25 minutes or until pastry is golden. Let cool slightly. Cut into slices to serve (approx. 8).

Note: You can make this ahead, cover loosely with foil, and let stand at room temperature for up to 4 hours; reheat to serve.

Don't chicken out...

Make chicken latkes for your Chanukah 'feast from the Mideast'

By NORENE GILLETZ

The flickering lights of the Chanukah menorah will join the lights of the Shabbat candles at sundown on Dec. 19. More than 2,000 years ago, a small band of Jews called the Maccabees drove the pagan armies out of Jerusalem and rekindled the eternal light in the holy temple. Enough ritually pure oil for only one day could be found, but a miracle occurred and the oil lasted for 8 days.

Potato latkes are traditionally served at most Chanukah celebrations. However, the Chanukah miracle involved oil, not potatoes, which didn't even exist in Israel at that time.

This year, don't be chicken! Experiment with some different kinds of latkes and also enjoy a culinary journey to the Mideast with Faye Levy's newest book, Feast from the Mideast (HarperCollins, $45.95 Cdn), featuring 250 sun-drenched dishes from the lands of the Bible. Levy is a national food columnist and award-winning author of more than 20 cookbooks. She brings a wealth of authentic Mideast recipes into the 21st century with this outstanding book.

Featuring the bold flavours and simple, healthy techniques from more than 10 countries, this collection offers dishes for every occasion, from dinner-party feasts to quick and healthy weekday meals. Levy offers menus such as "Supper for a Sultan" and "Buffet of Biblical Inspiration." Her seductive recipes will entice you to cast your culinary inhibitions aside and encourage you to experience this vibrant international cuisine.

Levy suggested some of the following dishes from her book for a Chanukah menu: Garlic Marinated Eggplant, Falafel Crusted Chicken, Lentils with Rice and Carmelized Onions and Yemenite Layered Flatbreads. For your celebration this year, think beyond borders with these authentic Mideast delicacies. Enjoy!

CHICKEN PATTIES IN GARLICKY MUSHROOM TOMATO SAUCE

Kofta Tavuk

Home and restaurant cooks throughout the Mideast make a variety of cakes like these from meat or chicken. Although they began as measures of frugality, these patties, often called kofta, are now prized. These can be served topped with a spoonful of tahini alongside and a generous mound of salad. A convenient way to enjoy these is to prepare a double batch and serve them sautéed one day, and heated in tomato sauce the next day.

4 slices stale white bread
1 lb. ground chicken
2 medium onions, minced
4 tbsp. chopped Italian parsley
$1\frac{1}{2}$ tsp. ground coriander
1 tsp. paprika
1 tsp. dried thyme
salt and freshly ground black pepper
6 large garlic cloves, chopped
2 large eggs
3 to 5 tbsp. olive oil
8 ounces mushrooms, sliced
$1\frac{1}{2}$ cups tomato sauce (homemade or bottled)

Dip each bread slice in bowl of water to moisten; squeeze dry. Mix bread with chicken, onions, 3 tbsp. parsley, coriander, paprika, thyme, 1 to $1\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. salt, $\frac{1}{2}$ tsp. pepper and half the garlic. Add eggs. Mix lightly but thoroughly. Broil or microwave a teaspoon of mixture and taste it for seasoning. Shape mixture into patties, using about $\frac{1}{3}$-cup mixture for each; flatten them.

Heat 3 tbsp. oil in large heavy skillet. Add enough patties to make one layer without crowding. Sauté over medium-low heat for 4 or 5 minutes per side; use two slotted spatulas to turn them carefully. If you're serving them simply sautéed, be sure they are cooked through; if you will be braising them in sauce, they need only be browned at this point. Sauté remaining patties in the same way, adding oil to skillet if necessary and heating it before adding more patties. Drain patties on paper towels. You can serve them at this point or braise them in sauce.

To make sauce for braising patties, reheat oil in skillet, add mushrooms and sauté over medium heat for 2 minutes. Add remaining garlic and cook $\frac{1}{2}$ minute, stirring. Add tomato sauce and $\frac{1}{4}$ cup water, cover and heat over low heat. Add a little more water if sauce is too thick. If you are braising the chicken cakes, return them to the skillet, cover and cook over low heat for 5 minutes, or until hot and cooked through. Taste sauce and adjust seasoning. Serve sprinkled with remaining parsley. Makes 4 servings.

MILES NADAL
JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTRE
Downtown Jewish Day School

After more than five decades, the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, popularly known as the Bloor "Y", has been transformed into the new, modern Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"Jewish Toronto Tomorrow has given me the opportunity to ensure the continued vitality of our future, by refurbishing an institution of our past and by reinvigorating a facility which benefits not just Jewish Toronto, but indeed the entire city," said the centre's chief benefactor, Miles Nadal.

"I was not only absolutely thrilled with the grand opening of the Nadal Centre, but also that it attracted so many people from such a broad cross-section of the community," says Naomi Rose, Executive Director, Miles Nadal JCC. "People were stunned to see the incredible transition we've made here. We really believe that the new Centre is going to be a catalyst for invigoration of the downtown Jewish community which has been growing at such a rapid pace over the past 10 years."

The history of the Miles Nadal JCC began in 1953, with the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

Moving from its original incarnation on Brunswick Avenue next to the Talmud Torah built in 1939, the Bloor JCC served the cultural, recreational and even the social assistance needs of Jews and non-Jews alike for 50 years.

"Historically, the whole downtown area of Toronto as been home to the Jewish community," says David Green, Chairman of the Miles Nadal JCC Capital Campaign. "The Nadal JCC is the cornerstone of that whole community."

Chanukah Foods

Slaying life's dragons with cheese latkes dreidel, dreidel, dreidel, made it out of

BY LISA J. SOLOMON

My 10-year-old daughter came home from school sad, her shoulders carrying the kind of weight that breaks a mother's heart. She faced a tough problem: friends who were no longer her true friends and were demanding that she compromise who she is or face being alone.

It's the kind of challenge we all meet many times in life, in different forms. It's the fear of being alone or changing who you are so as not to be alone. It's the challenge of one against the might of many, or the overwhelming feeling that the odds are stacked against you. It's the sense of being quietly different from the group, but nevertheless choosing to believe in yourself.

The Edible Chanukiah
Ideal for Chanukah Parties for all the kids (and kids at heart) to enjoy. Our chocolate Chanukiahs come in either Swiss milk or Belgian dark chocolate with real candy cane candles. They are celloed just like a gift basket; perfect for friends or family. They look real, but don't let the children try to light them!

We wish all our Customers a Joyous Chanukah

After talking with my daughter and realizing that, as she gets older, there will inevitably be times of pain and fewer and fewer quick fixes, I asked, "Do you want to make latkes?"

"Yes!" she said as she stood up and wiped away her tears. "But after my homework."

While she spread her heavy books on the kitchen table, I started to organize the counter: latke mix (sometimes instant gratification is in order), eggs, cold water, measuring cups, glass mixing bowls, and cheeses – cheddar, mozzarella, and feta.

I put out cheese because a few days earlier, while we were driving to gymnastics, I asked my daughter if she had any Chanukah recipe ideas, and, without missing a beat, she suggested cheese latkes.

"Just mix in some shredded cheddar cheese with the batter so it's a little bit cheesy," she said.

The idea sounded full of promise.

The next day, as I continued my Chanukah research in The Jewish Holidays: A Guide and Commentary, by Michael Strassfeld, I discovered the importance of cheese, women, and courage in the Chanukah story.

It seems that beneath the larger story of Chanukah – of Mattathias and his sons leading a band of Jewish partisans to liberate the temple in Jerusalem – there lies the story of a lone, brave woman.

During one of many attacks on a town near Jerusalem, the Jews felt they had no hope. So, according to the story, a woman named Judith slipped out of the city and into the Syrian camp, catching the approving eye of the Syrian general. She then prepared a beguiling feast for him, including a spread of cheeses to make him thirsty. He drank too much wine, fell asleep and Judith beheaded him. As the Book of Judith explains, the sight of their general dead and the Jews marching with his head caused the Syrian army to flee.

Given the day my daughter had, and the ones she would inevitably face, making cheese latkes seemed perfect.

I passed her the ingredients so she could create her own version of the latkes.

With the whisk in her right hand and the rim of a large glass bowl in her left, she stirred two eggs into a smooth yellow liquid. Next, she added cold water and mixed some more. Then, she measured a ½-cup mixture of shredded cheddar and mozzarella cheese. I thought it would not be enough cheese to make a difference, but she disagreed.

After she put the batter carefully in the oil – a first for her – we fried her latkes to a perfect golden brown. While the oil crackled, and the cheese latkes crisped, the kitchen and her face filled with new warmth.

Halfway through the bowl of batter, we decided to sample the hot latkes piling up on a platter. Lo and behold, as in the Book of Judith, a little bit of cheese went a long way. And the taste, as my daughter predicted, was just cheesy enough.

Emboldened by her success and by Judith's idea of salty cheese, I set aside some of the batter and added crumbled feta cheese and a sprinkle of finely chopped walnuts and fried those as the last batch. I wanted to try a saltier version, a more potent, grown-up cheese latke. And it worked. The toasted walnuts added an unexpected crunch, like a touch of mischief, and the bright white feta fried into the golden batter added visual texture and a fun salty bite.

It was enough to invoke a generous thirst – but not to overpower enemies, to empower yourself.

As my daughter and I stood together at the kitchen counter, enjoying our versions of cheese latkes, I realized that on deeply trying days, sometimes all we can do is make an effort – take one small step, as one person who believes in greater results, and share your discoveries with one true friend.

RACHEL'S QUICK CHEESE LATKES

This recipe is quick and straightforward enough for your counter-height kids to make – with parental supervision. And the melting strands of cheese added on top as a garnish makes an almost pizza cheesy latke experience.

1 6-oz box potato latke mix
2 eggs
2 cups cold water
½ cup shredded cheddar/mozzarella mix
½ cup vegetable oil for frying

Cheese latkes — great comfort food

In a medium bowl, beat eggs. Add water and mix well. Stir in package mix and add cheese. Let rest five minutes. Stir again. In large skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat until hot but not smoking. Working in batches, drop heaping tablespoons of batter into hot oil. Flatten with the back of a slotted spatula. Brown on each side, about one minute, until golden brown. Using slotted spatula, transfer latkes onto paper towel to drain. Add more oil to skillet if needed, allowing to heat before adding more batter. Transfer to plates and serve.

Servings: 15-18 latkes.

Serving suggestions: Serve warm with garnish of shredded cheese and a side dish of applesauce.

INSTANT FETA WALNUT LATKES

These are so flavourful, they would be wonderful as an appetizer, with cold sliced pears and, of course, lots of wine. Who knows what miracles may come!

1 6-oz, box potato latke mix
2 eggs
2 cups cold water
1/2 cup feta cheese, crumbled into tiny chunks
1/2 cup finely chopped walnuts
1/2 cup vegetable oil for frying

Place walnuts in a single layer on a baking pan and place in 350-degree oven.

At about 3-4 minutes, shake pan to make sure the nuts toast evenly and continue to bake until they are lightly toasted and aromatic, approximately 6-10 minutes. (Hint: Be sure and watch carefully because nuts burn quickly.) Set aside to cool.

In a medium bowl, beat eggs. Add water and mix well. Stir in package mix and let rest five minutes. Add walnuts and crumbled cheese and stir again.

In large skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat until hot but not smoking.

(Hint: I found that frying these latkes worked best with slightly less oil then traditional potato latkes.) Working in batches, drop heaping tablespoons of batter into hot oil. Flatten with the back of a slotted spatula. Brown on each side, (about one minute) until golden brown. Using slotted spatula, transfer latkes onto paper towel to drain. Add more oil to skillet if needed, allowing to heat before adding more batter. Transfer to plates and serve. Makes 15-18 latkes.

Serving suggestions: Serve warm with sliced pears or a chunky applesauce.

Chanukah Foods

Happy cooking from COR

For eight days, Chanukah is observed with candlelighting, games and delicious food as we recall and rejoice in the liberation of Jerusalem and the right to practise our religion.

The Kashruth Council of Canada has prepared some recipes to help enhance your Chanukah or to serve throughout the year.

SMOKED SALMON BALLS

Easy and can be made ahead of time.

1 lb. smoked salmon (lox)
½ lb. cream cheese
1 tsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. light cream
salt and pepper to taste
dried dill weed, crushed

Grind salmon in food processor or mash until fine. Combine with remaining ingredients except dill. Shape into balls and roll in dill weed. Chill and serve on picks. Refrigerate until serving time. Yield: 40-50 balls.

GINGERED CARROT AND ORANGE SOUP

(Dairy)

2 tbsp. oil
6 medium carrots, thinly sliced
1 parsnip, thinly sliced
1 large onion, finely chopped
1 tsp. grated orange rind
¼ tsp. ground ginger
3 cups water
2 tbsp. orange juice
2 tbsp. lemon juice
salt and pepper to taste
½ tsp. oregano (optional)
½ tsp. basil (optional)
½ cup milk or light cream
Garnish: Chopped flat leaf parsley, orange or lemon slices.

Heat oil in saucepan. Add the next 5 ingredients. Cook covered for 5 minutes on medium heat. Add water, bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer covered for about 10 minutes or until vegetables are tender. Puree in small batches in blender or food processor. Add orange and lemon juice, blending until smooth. Reheat. Add seasonings; stir in milk or cream. Serve hot or at room temperature garnishing with chopped parsley, and float an orange or lemon slice on each serving. Serves 5-6.

Note: To make pareve, add ½ cup pareve cream in place of the milk.

GOAT CHEESE, VEGETABLE AND PASTA SALAD

½ cup pecans or ⅓ cup pine nuts
1 cup snow peas
1 cup grape tomatoes
½ cup black olives
1 red, yellow and orange pepper, cut in thin strips
¼ tsp. dried thyme
6 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil freshly ground pepper to taste
6 cups penne, fusilli or shell pasta (whole wheat if available)
2 medium zucchini, cut thin strips
3 tbsp. chopped flat leaf parsley
8 oz. goat cheese, crumbled or feta cheese

Preheat oven to 350. Roast nuts, about 5 minutes for pecans and 3 minutes for pine nuts. Set aside.

Top and string snow peas and blanch in boiling water for 2 minutes. Drain and rinse under cold water; dry thoroughly. Combine snow peas, tomatoes, olives, peppers, thyme and olive oil in a large bowl. Season with freshly ground pepper.

Bring a large pot of salted water to a boil; add pasta. Cook uncovered over high heat, stirring occasionally, about 8 minutes or until tender but firm to the bite. Before draining, add zucchini and cook another 2-3 seconds. Drain, rinse with cold water and drain well. Add to bowl of vegetables and toss. Taste and add 2 tbsp. more oil if desired. Add parsley, goat cheese or feta cheese and roasted nuts; toss lightly. Serve warm or at room temperature. Can be kept covered up to 8 hours in refrigerator. Serves 4 as main dish or 8 as side dish.

HERBED POTATO LATKES

6 medium-sized potatoes
1 egg, well beaten
⅓ cup grated onion
1½ tsp. baking powder
1 cup bread crumbs, flour or matzah meal
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ tsp. rosemary
¼ tsp. thyme
1 tsp. lemon juice or powdered ascorbic acid
oil for frying

Pare potatoes, wash, cover with water and refrigerate for 2 hours. Grate potatoes into cold water, then strain them in a fine strainer until dry. Combine with remaining ingredients except oil.

Heat about ¼-inch depth of oil in a large, heavy skillet. Using ¼-cup dry measuring cup, fill with batter. Drop into hot oil, flatten with fork to about 3 inches in diameter. Fry on each side until golden brown. Add more oil as needed. Drain well on absorbent paper. Serve with applesauce or sour cream. Potato latkes can be frozen on a cookie sheet. When frozen, transfer into plastic bags. To reheat, preheat oven to 450, place latkes on cookie sheet, let thaw for 15-20 minutes and bake, watching carefully to avoid burning. Enjoy! Yield: 12-15 latkes.

CHANUKAH ORANGE CAKE

(Pareve)

fine dry bread crumbs
2½ cups all purpose flour
1 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
½ cup hard margarine or Crisco
1¼ cups sugar
2 eggs, separated plus 3 egg yolks
rind of 2 oranges
⅔ cup orange juice
1 tsp. lemon juice

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-inch or 10-inch tube pan with removable bottom. Dust with bread crumbs. Sift together the flour, baking powder and salt and set aside.

In mixmaster, cream margarine or Crisco, add sugar, beat until fluffy. Add the 5 egg yolks, one at a time, beating well after each addition until mixture is smooth. On low speed, add the dry ingredients alternately with the rind and orange juice. Beat only until flour is incorporated. Remove from mixmaster.

Beat the 2 egg whites with the lemon juice until stiff. Fold into cake batter. Pour into tube pan. Level by turning briskly back and forth. Bake 1 hour or until cake tester comes out dry. Cool in pan for 20 minutes. Run a knife around outer and inner edge of cake pan. Invert on a cake plate which is covered with wax paper. Run a knife along bottom.

Glaze: Mix ½ cup orange marmalade with 2 tbsp. water in a small saucepan. Bring to boil. Brush top and sides of cake. Let stand for several hours. Cut or tear away wax paper. Garnish with thin orange slices cut in half. Serves 12-15.

LISA-ANN LAUREN POSLUNS ז"ל

Our Daughter, Our Sister, Our Friend

March 30, 1964 – November 2, 2002
17 Nisan 5724 – 28 Cheshvan 5763

REMEMBERING ONE YEAR LATER...REMEMBERING YOU WE WILL NEVER FORGET

Our darling Lisa, it is with profound sadness, heartbreaking grief, and endless love that we mark one full year since you were so tragically and viciously stolen away from us. We miss you desperately. Our hearts are broken and our lives are forever changed without you here with us. It is so hard to go on living without you. Our Shabbat and holiday dinners, our weekend visits, our walks and our talks...all of our shared times are now gone or drastically distorted without you. We know your spirit is with us. We pray to God to shelter and protect you, to watch over and bless your precious, gentle soul, and to keep you safe in Heaven in a way that God could not on Earth. If Heaven is filled with beauty, light, and peace, then we know you must be there, because we know no other person who radiated more grace, light, beauty, and gentle loving kindness than you.

It is with profound love and the very deepest respect and admiration that we remember you today, tomorrow, and forever, our beloved and enormously devoted daughter and sister, our fun and wonderful Auntie Lis, granddaughter, niece, cousin, dearest friend, and most loyal colleague. You were too good to be true, but true you were and will stay forever in our hearts. We will never forget what was done to you, how viciously you were attacked, and how brave you had to be. If only we could have been there that night of terror to help and protect you. We will always remember your loving heart, as giving and great as the universe, your boundless energy and joy of living, your grace and elegance – you were always a lady, a delicate and beautiful rose. We will forever remember your sunshine smile and laughter, your dignity and deep courage, the comfort and sparkling joy of your presence.

Dear Lis, you accomplished so very much and gave so much to others in your short life. You were so young for someone with such remarkable achievements, all earned through your own honest, hard work, through the intelligence, insight, and creativity of your wonderful mind, and through the commitment and devotion of your heart. We are so proud of you, of the kindness , charity and friendship you showed to the community, of the fantastic business that you built, of your loyalty to everyone in your life. You took such good care of all of us. And you cared about everyone and everything. You especially cared when anyone was hurt or unjustly treated.

There was so much more you wanted to do in your life, Lis, some very special dreams waiting to be fulfilled. There was so much more love and joy to be given and received, so many more dinners, music, memories, cups of tea, hugs, and stories to be shared, so many more candles to be lit. And now, with whom will we share our laughter, with whom our tears...? Our dearest Lisa, as your beloved friend, Pauline, said, everyone who knew you was touched by an angel. We cherish you, our shining star and beacon in the night.

WITH ALL OUR TEARS AND LOVE

We extend our deepest gratitude to the many special people who have been here for us and for Lisa over the past year, with flowers, candles, cards and letters, donations in Lisa's memory, kind words, prayers, and shared memories, taking care of us in every way possible the day our world fell apart and all the dark days, weeks, and months that have followed: feeding us, driving us, running errands, writing letters, listening to us, lending us a shoulder to lean on, checking in with us, and giving us support in countless ways in our time of extreme tragedy and sorrow – loving family, dear friends and neighbours, some of whom travelled from far places to be with us, Lisa's loyal clients and colleagues, Lisa's support staff and advisors, Lisa's loving neighbours and fellow members of the Bloor-Yorkville community, the charitable organizations to which Lisa devoted herself, members of the Toronto Real Estate Board, and concerned rabbis, cantors, and ministers. To Jerry, who guided us in prayer throughout the seven days of Shiva and sang the special song of peace for Lisa every day: thank you from our hearts; we love you. To Eleanor and Tara, who played music and sang so sweetly for Lisa and for us, we thank you. We will never forget that you were there for us: it made all the difference. Our sincerest thanks go to all the wonderful staff, volunteers, and Chevra Kadisha at Benjamin's and Landmark for their kindness, concern, professionalism, patience, and direction. We know it was hard. Heartfelt thanks to Michael's Buddy, for all the kisses and furry companionship that terrible day - you are truly a human being's best friend.

To our fellow citizens of Toronto, of Ontario, and of Canada, from the east coast to the west, and to the people from the United States, Israel, England, Scotland, Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, Holland, and Scandinavia, we thank you so much for your beautiful cards, letters, e-mail notes, and telephone calls; your prayers and kind words about Lisa mean so much to us and, we know, to her. We are still reading them and will continue to turn to them for strength.

Finally, on behalf of Lisa and all our family, we extend our deepest possible thanks, recognition, and appreciation to the incredible team of police officers, detectives, and police support staff at the Toronto Police Service and the Ontario Provincial Police who have been there with us and for us from the very beginning, for your never-ending hard work, for your commitment to our family and the community at large, for your kind words of support, for your continuous care, protection, patience, and professionalism, and for putting your own lives at risk to help us and keep all of our community safe. You are without equal; you are truly the very best people any citizen or country could hope for. We are eternally grateful.

Thank you all for honouring and remembering Lisa's life and for being with us, to that end, numerous times throughout this past year. And special thanks go to the kindest of souls who came out on a cold wet night on Sunday, November 2, 2003, for the candlelight vigil in Lisa's memory. That would have meant more to Lisa than words can say.

We love you and miss you always and forever, Lis.

13-year-old B.C. teen raises $1,000 for Israel

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Many 13-year-olds in Canada are dedicated – to their friends, sports and other recreational activities. But sometimes you'll find one who is preoccupied with the effects of a political crisis a continent away.

Tyler Golden, from Richmond, B.C., speaks softly and modestly about his participation in Kids For Kids, an organization that helps young victims of terrorism in Israel. Kids for Kids provides services to children who have witnessed an attack or seen a friend or family member fall victim to one, including support groups, therapeutic arts programs and bereavement and psychological counselling.

As the organization's Vancouver representative, Tyler's mission is to raise funds and awareness. He corresponds by e-mail with other kids and teachers who want to learn more about Kids For Kids, and he sets up information booths at Jewish events where he distributes flyers and solicits donations. Over the past year, he has raised $1,300.

"Tzedakah was a big issue for Tyler during his bar mitzvah last November, and he felt a strong sense of wanting to give back to the community," said his mother, Kathy.

Tyler donated $1,000 from his bar mitzvah gifts to help purchase a needle-less syringe pump for the Schneiders Children's Medical Center in Israel.

In the process of researching other causes to become involved with, he learned about Kids For Kids.

In just under a year with the organization, Tyler has created pledge forms, letterhead, business cards and t-shirts displaying the Kids For Kids logo.

"I like to do this," said Tyler, who also enjoys skiing and waterskiing. "It makes me feel good to know I'm helping other kids who are less fortunate than me."

His mother said there's something different about her eldest son.

"There's a spark in this kid, an amazing neshamah," she said. "Tyler has always pushed us to bring more yiddishkeit into our home, and it's because of him that my husband and I take Jewish courses and are involved in Jewish learning right now. We used to call him Rabbi Tyler," she said with a laugh.

Rabbi Yechiel Baitelman, the director of Chabad of Richmond, where Tyler studies, said, "The project he's undertaken speaks for itself. I don't see many kids his age doing stuff like this, taking the initiative and doing a project that involves caring for others across the ocean."

Many ‘ethnic Jews’ actually Christians: census analysis

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Association for Canadian Studies (ACS) has re-crunched some numbers from the 2001 Canadian census and found that of the 348,610 Canadians who said they were at least partly ethnically Jewish, about 10 per cent were Catholics and Protestants.

“A mixed marriage occurring somewhere within one’s descendancy has resulted in nearly 34,000 Christians [Catholics and Protestants] in Canada indicating a Jewish ethnic background within multiple declarations of such origins,” said ACS executive director Jack Jedwab.

Jedwab said the ACS was able to get the new results by cross-tabulating figures on ethnicity and religion available only to those with access to Statistic Canada’s special census database, which contains a more detailed breakdown of how Canadians identified themselves.

The census, released last May, said 329,995 people listed Jewish as their religion.

Jewish is the only religion that is also classified as an ethnicity by the census. Respondents could only indicate one religion, but could indicate up to four ethnic origins.

According to the ACS’s new analysis, 13,890 Catholics in Canada said they had Jewish ethnic ancestry as one of their “multiple declarations,” while 20,005 Protestants said the same.

As well, 510 Jehovah’s Witnesses said they had Jewish ancestry, as did 660 Mormons.

In Quebec, 3,070 Catholics and 1,280 Protestants said they had Jewish ethnic ancestry, 5.3 per cent of the 82,450 Jewish ethnic total in the province.

In Ontario, the percentage was slightly higher. In that province, 16,460 Catholics and Protestants claimed Jewish ancestry, making up 8.3 per cent of the 196,265 provincial Jewish ethnic total.

Across the country, people from many other groups also claimed that they had some Jewish ancestry, and all were counted as part of the national Jewish ethnic total. They included Greek Orthodox (630), Russian Orthodox (485), pagans (275), Scientologists (35) and even Rastafarians (10).

In all, 46,425 of the 348,610 ethnic Jews identified by the census – or 13.3 per cent – were Canadians who gave “multiple origins” for ethnicity, among them “Jewish.”

“It shows the softness of the ethnicity category in determining religious populations. It might be a better idea to use only the religion category,” Jedwab said.

“But it also shows that when Canadians give multiple responses on the ethnicity [ancestry] question, they consider it important and relevant the fact that they have Jewish ancestry in declaring their identities. It means that they give value to it. They see it as salient.”

Demographer Charles Shahar of FEDERATION CJA, however, did not see the relevancy of the ACS’s ethnic breakdown, since the organized Jewish community doesn’t count Jews that way, not since he and McGill University demographer James Torczyner established the community’s criteria more than 20 years ago.

Shahar said the community gets its national Jewish total by adding together census respondents who call themselves Jewish both by religion and ethnicity, as well those who list Jewish as their religion but list other ethnicities (such as Canadian), or say they have no religion but list Jewish as their only ethnicity.

Canadians who define themselves as Jewish by ethnicity but indicate another religion are not counted.

“This other category [the ACS is using], ‘Another religion with some Jewish ethnicity,’ is tenuous as best,” Shahar said.

“These are not new numbers, just another level you get to if you cross-tabulate. These are people who might have had some distant ancestry that was Jewish, but so what? It is just not part of our standard religious definition. They are so minimally affiliated that they are not relevant. So it’s a moot point.”

But Jedwab said the numbers on ethnicity are “still relevant.”

He noted that Shahar came up with his own national total of 379,000 Jews by adding together the census religion figure of 329,995 to the 50,000 or so people who said they were ethnically Jewish but had “no religion,” meaning they are atheists or agnostics.

The most newsworthy part of these new figures, Jedwab said, “is the extent to which Christians declared that they were also in part ethnically Jewish.

“This is new information,” he said. “Whether these 40,000-plus should be counted as part of the Jewish community is a matter for sociologists and demographers to decide.”

An honest reflection that can't be ignored

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

In the Dec. 1 issue of the Jerusalem Report, a column by founding editor Hirsh Goodman, titled "A Look in the Mirror," deserves close attention.

While much time and energy is being spent in the Diaspora trying to influence media coverage of Israel, Goodman writes, "the only institution that can do anything about Israel's image is the Israeli government itself."

Goodman, director of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Program on Information Strategy at Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center has a following among many western journalists and should not be ignored. Last February, he wrote a paper for the centre called "Israel's Need for an Information Strategy," in which he outlined Israel's predicament vis-à-vis the media: "The demand for news has become insatiable, with dozens of 24-hour news channels created and servicing virtually every point on the globe. For Israel, mired in the current violent… conflict, the military-media dynamic is especially complex. The imagery alone is problematic… [B]ecause much of the fighting takes place in densely populated urban environments… the quintessential image is that of a state-of-the-art army advancing on a beleaguered civilian population… Also, much of the footage broadcast by the international media has been provided by Palestinian camera crews equipped with light video cameras and, often, an agenda."

Israel, as a democracy, is an open, pluralistic society, complete with vibrant political debates and intense self-criticism. However, it is in conflict with an adversary that speaks with a unified voice. In advocating the development of an overall information strategy, Goodman calls for the creation of "one inter-departmental body to co-ordinate Israel's relations with the media, articulate what its message should be and advise how best to disseminate it." But in the ever-fractious, sometimes chaotic atmosphere of Israel, the establishment of such a body remains remote.

Meanwhile, Goodman has become increasingly impatient with government policies that he believes do Israel unnecessary harm. In his Jerusalem Report column, he condemns the settlers "from an illegal hill top settlement near Yitzhar" who destroyed 200 olive trees that provided neighbouring Palestinians with their livelihoods.

To Goodman, not only do such actions present a negative image of Israel, but they also reflect negatively on Israel's policies, "which are beginning to look more and more draconian as the country flounders leaderless and visionless in a war without an end."

Of course, Israel should insist on the rule of law for all its citizens, even during war. However, Israel is – as many analysts have noted – held to a much higher standard of conduct than virtually every other country. This intense scrutiny of Israel's real or alleged misdeeds, which are so often amplified beyond all proportion while its virtues are ignored, is resulting in negative fallout that we are only beginning to grapple with today, including the frightening rise of anti-Semitism around the world.

To a degree, of course, Goodman understands this. "Israel has much to be enraged about in this war – and much to be enraged with the press about. The media has not always been fair and has even sometimes been grossly unfair." Anyone who remembers Goodman's column from June 17, 2002, in which he swore at a European journalist who accused Israel of committing a "massacre" at Jenin, will understand the impact of that remark. However, he goes on to bemoan the fact that "Israel is so expert at giving those who want to say bad things about the country so much to talk about."

Goodman's latest column forces us to grapple with the complexities of Israel's actions, and how the media portray them. He is colourful, controversial and often provocative, but never boring or dull – like Israel itself.

Triple celebration held in Kimberley, B.C.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — British Columbia witnesses hundreds of bar mitzvahs each year, the vast majority of them occurring in a synagogue with the usual festivities and lavish spread.

This one was different.

For a start, it took place in the remote town of Kimberley, B.C., Canada's highest altitude city and one of the Rockies' classic mining towns. The only Jewish kids in town, Benjamin (14), Nathaniel (13) and Rachel (12) Cohen, had learned their Torah portions over the telephone, phonetically, with a religious leader in Kelowna, a city 560 kilometres away. On Nov. 15, the three children stood at a podium in the Trickle Creek Golf Resort and recited their Haftorahs before a crowd of 65.

Learned Torah portions over the telephone

Adopted at birth, the Cohen children were converted to Judaism at the age of three, and though they spent most of their young lives in remote areas far from the larger Jewish community, they maintained a strong Jewish identity.

"Though we've lived in places where they're the only Jews in school, they've always been proud to stand up and say I'm Jewish," said their mother, Carol Cohen.

"We've never really had the regular supports of a Jewish community because of the isolation we're in, and despite this, the kids have been able to maintain their Jewishness, share it with their friends and even educate their friends regarding what it means."

She added, "They've probably only been to synagogue 10 times in their lives."

Some of those occasions were to witness bar and bat mitzvahs of other kids, an experience that left the three determined to have their own celebrations when they came of age.

The obstacles were significant. Cohen began looking for a rabbi or religious leader who might be prepared to teach her children, who had never been to Hebrew school and had little Jewish education. Eventually, she found Sam Larry, the religious leader of the Okanagan Jewish Community in Kelowna, B.C.

"He immediately understood what our goals were and thought it was a great idea," Cohen said.

Over the next four months, there was a series of faxes, visits and regular telephone calls between the Cohens and Larry as Benjamin, Nathaniel and Rachel studied their blessings and portions, practising every night until they attained fluency. The weekend of the triple ceremony, the Cohen kids blessed the candles, wine and challah on Friday night, and the next day, recited the aliyah blessings, the Haftorah blessings and the Haforah.

"The nachas and pride were overwhelming," Larry said. "I thought their grandparents were going to pass out. In their wildest dreams, they hadn't imagined what kind of bar mitzvah this would be, and they couldn't stop crying the whole weekend.

"What impressed me was their parents' desire to raise their kids Jewishly, not an easy task when you're living out in the boondocks," Larry said.

"I helped the children prepare their speech to their parents and visitors, and it was about how proud they were to participate, to advocate their Judaism. That's one of the reasons I chose to do this."

Analysis

Many will have none of that. As the Vancouver Sun stated emphatically last month, the Chrétien government has been "a huge disappointment and source of frustration to Canada's Jewish community."

True, if the number of angry letters to the editor of The CJN over the past decade is any gauge. Many readers have fumed that given the Liberals' sorry record of Israel-bashing at the United Nations, their failure to adequately speak out against anti-Semitism, especially on university campuses, and other domestic debacles, it's high time Canadian Jews end their historic ties to the Grits and embrace the Israel-friendly stance of the Canadian Alliance.

To be sure, Chrétien is leaving on a sour note, having shaken the hands of Malaysia's Jew-hating former prime minister, Mahathir Mohamad, without rebuking Mahathir for his diatribe, and of Hezbollah Secretary General Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah at the Francophonie summit in Beirut last October – both in seemingly oblivious fashion.

On the other hand, others in the loop, either in government or community advocacy, will tell you the Chrétien Liberals engaged in more quiet, behind-the-scenes diplomacy – and even up-front efforts – on matters Jewish and relating to Israel than the community appreciates.

Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, believes there's "no question" the community would hand Chrétien an across-the-board "F" on a report card.

But, says Landy, who held several meetings with Chrétien over the years, "That's just not fair. The level of satisfaction has to be measured against continuing concerns at [Canada's] UN voting, but this prime minister did things no other did."

Indeed, Chrétien was the first sitting prime minister to visit Israel, the first to implement a free trade deal with Israel and the first to travel to the site of the Auschwitz concentration camp.

With Israel, there were bumps in the road. But the passport affair, in which Israeli secret agents were caught using forged Canadian passports; the dispute between El Al and Air Canada; and the controversy over Magen David Adom's charitable status – none caused long-term damage.

In fact, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) says Israel regards Canada as its second-best friend, after the United States.

Overall, Landy said, Chrétien's record runs hot and cold. For example, with few exceptions, the Liberals failed to vote against a continuous stream of Arab-inspired anti-Israel resolutions at the UN (on most, Canada abstained). He called the party's voting record the "most disappointing" aspect of Chrétien's tenure.

But in two other notable instances, Landy pointed out, Canada exceeded expectations at the UN. At the Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in the fall of 2001, Canada worked hard to blunt the final statement's anti-Israel tone and in the end, dissociated itself from parts of the communiqué.

And last year at the meeting of the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, Israel approached Canada to step in after the United States was forced out of the conference, and beseeched this country to run interference for the Jewish state. Canada agreed, to hearty thanks from then-deputy foreign minister Rabbi Michael Melchior.

Canada also won praise a few years back for ending Israel's isolation at the UN by working to bring it into one of the world's body's regional groupings.

But the Jewish community is more likely to remember Canada's support for the infamous UN Resolution 1322, which condemned Israel for using excessive force in putting down Palestinian violence.

The anger in the late autumn of 2000 was palpable. At rallies across the country, Chrétien and his government were denounced, sending even friendly MPs and cabinet ministers scurrying for cover.

Chrétien's fence-mending yielded actual results. Following a hastily-arranged, 45-minute meeting with Jewish leaders, he opened a direct pipeline between the community and his office to head off future flare-ups and bypass an increasingly hostile foreign affairs department. The unprecedented move caught even community leaders off-guard.

"I've always defended an independent Israel with secure borders," Chrétien told The CJN in a November 2000 interview, just before winning the federal election.

Chrétien's relations with Canadian Jewry fell into three rough categories: domestic affairs, bilateral relations with Israel and voting at the UN.

He hit the ground running. Only a month after taking office, he met with then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. A year later, the two met again in Ottawa to sign the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement. (It was the Canadians who persisted; Rabin was said to be indifferent.)

The agreement took effect Jan. 1, 1997 and within five years, Canada-Israel bilateral trade almost doubled, to about $1 billion.

Chrétien attended Rabin's funeral in 1995.

Also that year, at a Yad Vashem tribute dinner in Toronto, Chrétien came the closest of any post-World War II prime minister to apologizing for Canada's dismal record of admitting war-era Jewish refugees.

The same year was a watershed for Quebec Jews, who looked to Chrétien to defeat the separatists. Instead, Quebec nationalists came within a whisker of breaking up the country.

In May 1998, he and his wife Aline were front-and-centre at Israel's 50th birthday bash in Toronto, and he spoke admiringly of Israel and its accomplishments.

He did the same at the CIC's annual parliamentary dinner in March 2000, where he announced he would visit Israel the next month.

The trip, though groundbreaking, generated blazing headlines of gaffes and diplomatic foul-ups here at home. Canadian media and opposition politicians blasted Chrétien for several fumbles: for snubbing Arabs in east Jerusalem (irking Palestinians), advising Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat that a unilateral declaration of independence could be a useful bargaining tool (irking Israel and handing ammunition to Quebec separatists), stating Israel was "right" to want to keep the Sea of Galilee (irking Syria), and dealing with unsubstantiated reports that Canada had agreed to accept up to 15,000 Palestinian refugees (alarming his own staff) – all in less than four days.

To the delight of his Israeli hosts, he told reporters he didn't know whether he was in "east, west, north or south Jerusalem," in response to queries about the city's status.

Those events overshadowed the awarding to Chrétien of an honorary doctorate from Hebrew University, and warm talks with then-prime minister Ehud Barak.

In an interview with the Vancouver Sun last month, Landy slammed Chrétien as "completely oblivious. He goes to Jerusalem and doesn't know which part of Jerusalem he's in. I think this reflects a lack of sensitivity, a total lack of appreciation for the depth of the issues."

Landy tempered those remarks in speaking with The CJN.

"There was no deliberate malice. It was just an inability to express himself."

Chrétien's verbal missteps also spurred the CIC to ask him on several occasions to clarify remarks that seemed contrary to long-standing Canadian policy on the Middle East.

But the CIC acknowledges that under Chrétien, ministerial visits between Canada and Israel have become routine.

Chrétien was also taken to task for foot-dragging when it came to outlawing terrorist organizations. Canada did not ban Hamas and Islamic Jihad until a year ago. For a long time, the government drew a distinction between the military and charitable activities of Hezbollah, but the group was finally outlawed last December. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade was added to the list this past spring, but Ottawa refused Israel's request to add the PLO and the Palestinian Authority.

It was also on Chrétien's watch that Canada changed its policy on suspected Nazi war criminals, from criminal prosecutions in Canadian courts to stripping them of citizenship and deporting them. Of most of the 18 cases initiated since 1993, two suspects left the country voluntarily, six died and seven decisions were made in favour of revocation of citizenship and deportation.

Community leaders may grouse at the paltry results, but allow it's a lot more than took place under the previous Tory administration.

Many Canadian Jews wish Chrétien's government would have shown greater solidarity with Israel, or at least more understanding of Israel's plight, says McGill University sociologist Morton Weinfeld, one of the nation's premier watchers of Canadian Jewry.

"Nevertheless," he adds, "during his tenure, but not necessarily because of it, life in Canada remained on the whole very good for Jews. It remains a good place for Jews to live."

Winnipeg mission back from Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For Marianne Mihychuk, Manitoba's minister of trade and commerce, one of the highlights of her first trip to Israel was a visit to the Winnipeg Community Action Centre in Be'er Sheva.

The centre aims to teach computer skills to children whose families have immigrated to Israel from Ethiopia.

"The kids say they are going to Winnipeg to play computer," she said.

She added that she was impressed with Israel's ability to settle people from different regions and backgrounds.

Stuart Murray, leader of Manitoba's Progressive Conservative party and leader of the Opposition, described his first visit to Israel as "an amazing learning experience.

"This trip was so incredible that my wife and I were physically and emotionally drained when we got home. Each experience and speaker was more incredible than the last," he said.

Murray and Mihychuk were among a group of 60 Winnipeggers, including Winnipeg Mayor Glen Murray and a dozen other non-Jewish business and political leaders, who signed on for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's third solidarity mission to Israel.

"There was a wonderful chemistry amongst the members of our group," said Gerry Koffman, executive director of Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal.

"There were no differences between the Jewish and non-Jewish members of the group. We all felt a strong bond with the people of Israel."

In addition to visiting Be'er Sheva, Winnipeg's sister city, the tour included a stop in Haifa where the group visited the Technion, the Golan, Metulla and the Canada Centre, and Danciger High School in Kiryat Shmona, which has an ongoing relationship with Winnipeg's Jewish school programs.

They also toured Jerusalem, where they visited the Western Wall, Yad Vashem and Shaare Zedek Hospital.

They heard from a variety of experts, both political and military.

"We saw for ourselves how close everything is. We found out how close Metullah is to Lebanon and Syria, and Be'er Sheva to Gaza. We got this incredible sense among the Israeli people, of their determination to survive and live in peace in a region full of turmoil," said Murray.

At Shaare Zedek Hospital, Koffman, said, "we spoke to the person in charge of the trauma unit and had a first hand look at what happens as a result of a terrorist attack."

In Be'er Sheva, Murray and Ian Goldstine, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, officially dedicated a plaque at the Winnipeg Community Action Centre to the memory of the late Israel Asper, whose Asper Foundation provided the funding for the centre.

While in Israel, Murray and Mihychuk took the opportunity to meet with Israeli businesspeople and researchers to discuss potential co-operative ventures between Manitoba and Israel.

Mihychuk reported that Manitoba is considering starting a diamond exchange, for example, an area in which Israel has considerable experience.

"We discussed joint biotech ventures and talked about unmanned aircraft, an area in which Manitoba is a world leader.

"We are [also] going to be collaborating on an Israeli science education project that involves 200 students from Manitoba and Israel working together via the Internet," Mihychuk said.

"Overall, it was a fabulous trip," Mihychuk said, "I am not particularly religious but it was an incredible experience visiting the Jewish and Christian religious sites. I came away with a greater respect for religion and a better understanding of Judaism. I really want to thank the Jewish federation for including me in this mission."

Pipes' pro-Israel speech at UBC picketed, but peaceful

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Despite concerns about security, a speech by pro-Israel American academic Daniel Pipes at the University of British Columbia went off last Friday without a hitch.

About 40 to 50 noisy pro-Palestinian protesters outside the entrance to the Student Union Building's Norm Theatre were outnumbered by about 400 UBC students and members of the Lower Mainland Jewish community who came to hear the talk, and by uniformed and plainclothes police and security.

A February 2003 speech by Pipes at York University was almost cancelled for security reasons, and former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's September 2002 speech at Concordia University was called off when anti-Netanyahu demonstrations turned violent.

In the weeks leading up to Pipes' UBC speech, the Web site of the Vancouver chapter of the Palestinian Solidarity Group urged its members and other local activists to picket the event.

One op-ed piece in the UBC student newspaper the Ubyssey by two arts undergraduates called on students to "show opposition" to Pipes for his "blatantly racist positions" and "dogmatic MyCarthyite [sic] charges" on his Campus Watch Web site (www.campus-watch.org), which monitors and critiques academics known to be hostile to Israel.

Anti-Pipes demonstrators at UBC appeared to come from two groups: Jews for a Just Peace and the Palestinian Solidarity Group. A few people from each group waved flags and banners, shouted slogans and tried to hand out leaflets to people in the pro-Pipes crowd, who largely ignored the demonstrators as they slowly filed into the 400-seat underground venue.

Before entering, visitors had to leave items such as raincoats, umbrellas and bags at a coat check set up and staffed by members of the Alma Mater Society (AMS), UBC's student society.

The AMS said protesters were allowed to enter as long as they left their placards and banners outside and didn't try to disrupt Pipes' talk. But if any of the demonstrators entered the theatre, they did not make their presence known.

The title of Pipes' talk was "War in the Holy Land: Where Do We Go from Here?" The Israel Advocacy Clubs of UBC and Simon Fraser University sponsored the event. Ariel Zellman, president of the UBC club, introduced Pipes.

Pipes said there are two main reasons why the situation in Israel has deteriorated since the 1993 Oslo accords. First, Israeli governments made concessions to the Palestinians after 1993 in the belief their moves would be reciprocated. Instead, the Palestinians interpreted Israeli concessions as signs of weakness and revived their efforts to destroy Israel.

Second, Israeli governments had incorrectly assumed that deals made with Palestinian and Arab leaders would be accepted by the Palestinian and Arab populations. Pipes said future diplomacy is premature until the Palestinians accept the right of Israel to exist. Until then, he said, there should be no negotiation.

There were no attempts to disrupt the 30-minute speech or the 45-minute question-and-answer session that followed.

When the event ended on schedule at 1:20 p.m., Pipes left the stage and audience members filed out of the theatre, where they were met by about 20 protesters who, although fewer in number than earlier, were louder, but still peaceful.

Pipes was also the keynote speaker at Vancouver Hillel's gala fundraiser at the Delta Airport Hotel in suburban Richmond on Sunday night. According to a Hillel spokesperson, 420 people attended the event, making it the first time a Vancouver Hillel fundraiser has ever sold out. Pipes discussed Campus Watch, Muslim anti-Semitism and the importance of Hillel in Israel advocacy efforts on campus.

Palestinians seek fresh truce talks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian officials sought fresh truce talks with militants on Monday after Egyptian-brokered efforts to secure a comprehensive ceasefire failed.

Hamas, Islamic Jihad and three other Palestinian factions on Sunday rejected an Egyptian proposal to halt all attacks against Israelis to give new impetus to the road map peace plan.

But members of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction said they would not accept No as the final answer and would try to persuade militant factions to change their minds.

"The dialogue with the factions will continue inside the… territories, and the Palestinian cabinet will pursue its peace efforts despite the collapse of the Cairo talks," senior Fatah official Ahmed Ghneim told Reuters in Egypt.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia abruptly left the Cairo talks when it became clear they were hitting a dead end.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his aides offered the Palestinians an unspoken truce, saying Israel would cease military operations if Palestinian militants halted all attacks.

"Israel will make every effort to avoid any operations against terrorists. Obviously if the terror continues, Israel will feel responsible for the security of its citizens and Israel will act," Sharon told reporters Sunday.

Hamas said it was willing to halt attacks against civilians in Israel, but it would continue striking Jewish settlers and soldiers.

Israel rejected the offer, saying it would never agree to a truce that left more than 200,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip vulnerable to attack by Palestinian militants.

But a senior Israeli official said it was possible for the sides to observe an unspoken cessation of hostilities.

"We are not looking for any new promises or signed documents. These don't mean anything. What counts is the test of performance," the official said.

"If there is really quiet, if there are no terrorist attacks, then there is no reason for us to continue military operations," the official said, adding Israel would also ease conditions for Palestinian civilians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Ghneim blamed the Hamas decision to reject the truce on the group's misreading of the political climate.

"They had a very weird analysis of the international situation. They believe the United States, the Palestinian Authority and Israel are in a crisis, while they are not."

Israeli and Palestinian officials met Sunday to prepare for a Sharon-Qureia summit, in the hope that it will restart peace talks, the prime minister's office said.

Officials on both sides have been trying to arrange a summit since Qureia took office in November, but Qureia has said they must be well prepared. He was hoping to bring a comprehensive ceasefire proposal to the summit to force Sharon's hand.

The director of Sharon's office, Dov Weisglass, met with his Palestinian counterpart, Hassan Abu Libdeh, and negotiator Saeb Erekat for their second meeting in a week.

A statement from Sharon's office said the two-hour meeting was held in a friendly atmosphere and the sides would meet again.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia met Sunday to discuss the outcome of the talks.

At the talks in Cairo on Saturday evening, mediators led by Egyptian intelligence chief Gen. Omar Suleiman managed to work out a compromise formula under which Hamas and allied organizations made a general promise to "exclude Israeli and Palestinian civilians from the cycle of violence, contingent upon certain conditions."

Suleiman was to go to Washington on Monday, Israel Radio reported, to report to the American administration on the outcome of the talks.

Delegates said the talks failed Sunday.

"The talks have reached a dead end," said Husam Arafat, a senior official in the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine General Command. "There was no agreement on the Egyptian proposal for a total ceasefire or to authorize the Palestinian Authority to pursue peace moves." He added that the talks had ended in failure.

Husam Arafat and a senior Hamas official both said there would be no joint statement.

"The meeting ended without agreement on the major issues and there will be no joint statement," he said. "The factions will issue a press statement in which they will say they will pursue the dialogue in the future. It is a cover for failure."

During the talks, militants considered a pledge only to halt strikes inside Israel, leaving Israeli settlers and soldiers in the West Bank and Gaza as legitimate targets.

Sharon rejected the distinction. "Israel of course can't differentiate between citizens and soldiers," he said, "or whether one lives here or there."

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said after the talks collapsed that Israel could not be party to a ceasefire that did not include a declaration to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, Army Radio reported.

Qureia also said he wanted to reach an internal Palestinian agreement prior to reaching one with Israel.

Hamas is laying a hudna trap

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

There is no need for a ceasefire agreement as proposed by the Palestinians. Israel is prepared to keep the peace and limit its military activities to defence only, if the Palestinians keep the peace on their side and stop terror entirely.

That was the message delivered to PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia's bureau chief, Hassan Abu Labda, at a meeting Sunday with his Israeli counterpart, Dov Weisglass.

The difficulties in reaching an agreement between the Palestinian factions in Cairo are strengthening the notion in Jerusalem that the term "ceasefire" as meant by the Palestinians has an advantage for terror organizations.

The very making of a ceasefire agreement between Israel and terror groups would give the groups indirect recognition and lead to their military and political empowerment.

Therefore, the theory in Jerusalem is that it is better to reach an agreement with Qureia on military quiet and wait and see what real steps the Palestinian prime minister takes against the terror infrastructure, steps he has so far refused to take.

Still, the difficulties in Cairo should not be seen as the last word. This is the first stage of the negotiations among the Palestinians, which began long before Qureia came to Cairo. The current round got started several weeks ago, when the Egyptians invited Hamas leader Musa Abu Marzuk to preliminary talks.

At the outset, it became clear that Hamas sought to achieve a partial and temporary ceasefire so it could call the shots. Although Israeli army actions against Hamas have placed the group in a state of crisis, Hamas leaders outside the territories believe Israel is in greater crisis.

The talks between the heads of the Palestinian and the Israeli prime ministers' bureaus began together with the Cairo talks. It is already clear that Qureia wants to also address other subjects such as the settlements and the security fence – the first subjects Qureia will bring up when he meets Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

But Qureia has no chance of meeting Sharon unless he first achieves a clear agreement with Hamas and the other organizations to stop all terror activities. Hamas' first proposal, which it has made on previous occasions – that there are some groups of Israelis against which terror is permissible – is not even a basis for talks with Israel. Qureia's bureau knows this full well.

Negotiations between the two bureaus are also just at the starting point. Abu Labda and Weisglass have set up an additional meeting, and the two sides are preparing their next moves. Israel has said that if the road to quiet is a bumpy one, it can understand that the dismantling of the terror infrastructure cannot be done in one day. However it will require the fullest of efforts by the Palestinians who are prepared to do so.

Sharon promises to hold debate on Olmert's unilateral withdrawal plan

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon promised Monday that the cabinet would hold a debate on Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's suggestion that there be a unilateral withdrawal from most of the Gaza Strip and West Bank

He reiterated, however, that there would be no pullout from the Jewish enclave in Hebron.

Olmert, who also holds the communications and industry and trade portfolios, unveiled his plan for a pullout from the territories and some neighbourhoods on the outskirts of Jerusalem, in an interview Friday with the daily Yedioth Aharonoth.

Sharon was responding to harsh criticism from Transportation Minister Avigdor Lieberman, who slammed both Olmert and MK Meir Sheetrit for speaking to the media about issues that had not been discussed in cabinet.

"If we want to give up [land, settlements]," Lieberman said, "we don't need Olmert, because Yossi Beilin will do it far better," referring to former minister and Israeli co-author of the Geneva accord.

"Even if we follow Olmert and return to the 1967 borders," Lieberman added, "and give up east Jerusalem and the Western Wall, will the terror attacks stop? Will the Palestinians stop signing up volunteers? Will they stop manufacturing Qassam rockets?"

Lieberman also called Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat a "serial murderer" who had no intention of ending the terrorism, and lashed out at Sheetrit for declaring that illegal settlement outposts needed to be evacuated.

"I'm shocked at Sheetrit's statement," Lieberman said, "especially when there are over 100,000 illegal buildings within the Green Line that haven't been evacuated thus far. Do these structures not bother Sheetrit?"

Other right-wing ministers also criticized Olmert's position yesterday. Housing and Construction Minister Effi Eitam said that if Olmert's plan constituted new government policy, then his National Religious Party would not remain in the coalition.

"The moment these speeches become policy, turn into actions, then the government will not be able to continue in its current composition," Eitam told Army Radio.

Posters showing Olmert with Adolf Hitler were found plastered around Jerusalem's city centre overnight Saturday. They were removed and police launched an investigation to find those responsible.

At Monday's cabinet meeting, Interior Minister Avraham Poraz asked, "How can you explain what some dozens of Jews are doing in Hebron, an Arab city of a quarter million Arabs?"

The prime minister replied, "How can you dare think that Jews won't live in Hebron? How can we leave Hebron where 700 Jews are buried?"

Poraz retorted, "There are 900 Jews buried in Prague, but that's no reason why we have to take control there."

Several ministers expressed their support for Olmert's plan. Immigrant Absorption Minister Tzipi Livni told Army Radio that giving up some territories and settlements was unavoidable, and "it is preferable to do this within the framework of an agreement, but if not, then unilaterally."

Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, chair of the Shinui party, said Olmert had displayed great political courage, and his statements are worthy of serious consideration.

Israeli army reservists to be released at age 40

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Reservists in the Israel Defence Forces would be released from military duty at age 40, according to a plan proposed by the IDF general staff and approved Sunday by the ministerial committee responsible for reservist affairs.

The plan to lower the age limit for reserve duty from 45 to 40 was first reported in Ha'aretz two months ago. Reservists will no longer have to serve to 45 (or 41 for combat units).

However, the plan will not apply to officers, reservists serving in special units nor army rabbis and doctors.

Recent far-reaching restructuring within the IDF has allowed the defence establishment to better utilize its standing army and improve its technological support services so it has a reduced need for personnel.

According to current law, military reserve duty continues up until age 54. In practice, this age limit has been reduced several times over the years. The immediate impact of the change, which is likely to be implemented in 2004, will release 60,000 reservists from military duty, although those beyond the required age limit can volunteer, as many still do today beyond the current 45-year ceiling.

Brig.-Gen. Avi Zamir, head of planning in the army personnel unit, expects many people to continue to volunteer, as has been found in recent surveys among those doing regular reserve duty.

At Sunday's meeting, it was also agreed to reward reservists with additional tax breaks, and a bill containing such benefits would be introduced within a year, said Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz.

MK Avshalom Vilan of the left-wing Meretz party welcomed the move as the first step in recognizing the sacrifice reserve soldiers make.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 1

• Four Palestinians were killed during an Israeli raid against Hamas in the West Bank. The raid targeted the terror group's infrastructure in Ramallah. Three of those killed were armed, and one was a nine-year-old boy. Dozens of Palestinians were arrested in the sweep, which officials said had been planned for months.

Dec. 2

• Israeli officials sharply criticized U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell's planned meeting with the architects of the "Geneva accord." Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Friday's planned meeting between Powell and Yossi Beilin and Yasser Abed Rabbo, the principal Israeli and Palestinian architects of the unofficial peace plan, is a mistake. "I am certain of his friendship, but I would cast doubt on his judgement in this matter," Olmert said.

Dec. 3

• An attempt to carry out simultaneous suicide bombings in a Yokne'am school and in the city of Beit She'an are among several terror attacks foiled in the past two days by security forces.

Dec. 4

• U.S. President George W. Bush called the "Geneva accord" "productive," but added any agreement for the Middle East must include a Palestinian commitment to fight terror.

Dec. 5

• The Greek minister responsible for security at next year's Olympics in Athens said in an interview with Ha'aretz that Israel is playing an important security role for the Games. "Israel is a key country with respect to providing intelligence information and training and drilling the Greek security forces," Georgios Floridis said.

Israel charges Canadian in Hamas terror plot

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel is holding a Canadian Arab with alleged ties to Hamas on suspicion of planning terrorist attacks on North American Jews and Israelis visiting Canada.

Jamal Akkal, a 23-year-old resident of Windsor, Ont., is part of a Hamas operation that is expanding abroad for the first time, Israeli officials charge.

"I think Hamas is trying to kill Israelis and Jews wherever they can. In that sense, they're trying to expand their operations," said Ofir Gendelman, second secretary at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa.

Gendelman said Akkal received small arms and explosives training in Gaza, "to kill as many people as he could. He was supposed to be a front-line terrorist behind the lines, so to speak, using his Canadian citizenship as a cover to carry out terrorist attacks."

Akkal's Israeli lawyer, Jamil al-Qhateb, denied the allegations, telling the National Post his client was approached by Hamas, but spurned their offer to work for them. He said any information collected by Israeli interrogators was extracted under duress. Akkal, he said, was deprived of sleep for 20 days and admitted to "just eight bullets he was shooting, that's it, and they call it military training."

Gendelman called allegations of coercion "ridiculous. All investigations on security matters are conducted in full compliance with Israeli law, which is very strict. Under no circumstance was he mistreated or coerced. He confessed and revealed information by himself."

Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) was initially reported to be ready to rebuke Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon about his public statements about the Akkal arrest, suggesting it was inappropriate to discuss a case that is before the courts. The ambassador was called in to discuss the matter with Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, who later told reporters, "We are not calling in the Israeli ambassador for a reprimand. We are calling him in to discuss this case."

'Hamas is ... trying to expand'

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien later said Akkal is receiving consular services in Israel.

Meanwhile, two Windsor-area New Democratic MPs said they are working on Akkal's behalf. Brian Masse said he has written to the Canadian government on behalf of Akkal, calling for a fair trial, while Joe Comartin said he found Akkal's confession "strange," adding the use of sleep deprivation has been condemned by Amnesty International, the Windsor Star reported.

Akkal was born in a Gaza refugee camp and moved to Canada four years ago. He returned to Gaza in October – to find a bride, his family says – and was arrested on Nov. 1 as he was leaving for Egypt. He appeared in court briefly last week.

Gendelman said Akkal's recruitment marks a disturbing new trend and an escalation of Hamas operations abroad, making it, like Hezbollah and Al Qaeda, an international terrorist threat.

"A Canadian was trained to carry out terrorist attacks on Israelis and Jewish targets in Canada. This is very troubling," he said. "It doesn't mean there are no other terrorists sent here. We don't know."

"We are very confident of the abilities of the Canadian security services," Gendelman said. "I'm sure there is full co-operation between Israeli security services and their Canadian counterparts."

Manuel Prutschi, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress, said even prior to Akkal's arrest, the Jewish community was particularly vigilant about security.

"We have always been and remain security conscious. That's why we have a national security protocol. Institutions have measures in place to deal with security concerns," he said.

"At the same time, the first line of defence against terrorist threats rest with the security services. We know they are on top of their security responsibilities. They are certainly sensitive to the concerns of the Jewish community."

Prutschi pointed to the case of Ahmed Ressam, the Algerian terrorist convicted of a millennium bombing plot to blow up the Los Angeles airport. Ressam and his terrorist cell operated in Montreal and discussed attacking Jewish targets, he said.

"Islamist terrorism threatens everybody. But one of the extremely disturbing phenomena is that Jews emerge as a common denominator among all these Islamic terrorist groups," Prutschi said.

Sharansky urges EU not to appease extremists

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — Natan Sharansky, Minister of Diaspora Affairs, supported last Friday a disputed report by the European Union's anti-racism agency that partly blamed anti-Semitism on Muslim immigrants, suggesting it was withheld to "appease extremists."

The European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia (EUMC) initially withheld the report because it said it was flawed, but bowed to pressure last Thursday to publish it after criticism from Jewish groups and EU parliamentarians.

Sharansky met the authors of the study from the Centre for Research on Anti-Semitism at Berlin's Technical University and said their findings were in line with Israeli research.

"It is a very serious professional work. It more or less coincides with our studies," he said.

"There is a clear correlation between the size of the Muslim community in one or other country and the number of physical incidents of anti-Semitism, a kind of feeling of fear by Jews in the streets," he told a news conference in Berlin.

Sharansky said he saw a link between anti-Jewish sentiment among Muslims living in Europe and increasing tolerance of anti-Semitism from the extreme right and the radical left.

The study said a rise in anti-Semitic violence in Europe in the first half of 2002 was mainly due to right-wing extremists, radical Islamists and young Muslims, usually of Arab descent.

The EUMC said it withheld the report because it was based on too little data from too short a time period and said it objected to the study's suggestion that anti-Semitism was endemic among Arab or North African Muslims.

Sharansky, a former Soviet dissident, called for serious soul-searching about why the report was suppressed. "I think the arguments were a desire to appease some of the groups that can seem as potentially dangerous in Europe and you don't want really to incite. But… the moment you start appeasing extremists instead of fighting extremists, that is really dangerous."

While he said criticism of Israel should be allowed, Sharansky accused some European media outlets of using anti-Semitic clichés, pointing as an example to the newspaper cartoon published last January in the British Independent of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon eating Palestinian babies.

He showed journalists scenes from a recent Arabic-language television series that depicted Jews sacrificing a Christian boy and draining his blood for use in Passover bread, reviving a conspiracy theory that was widespread in medieval Europe.

Sharansky said the series, broadcast by the Beirut-based al-Manar channel which is run by the terrorist group Hezbollah, could be viewed in Europe by satellite and called for more countries to follow Australia's example and block the station.

Sharansky, who was last in the German capital 17 years ago when he was released from Soviet detention into what was then West Berlin, praised the German fight against anti-Semitism, which he said was "more resolute and effective" than elsewhere.

"From our monitoring Germany is doing better than France, England, Belgium and Holland," he said.

Scrutinizing the face of anti-Semitism

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A copy of a study commissioned by the European Union's Monitoring Center on Racism and Xenophobia, which was allegedly supressed to avoid offending Europe's large Muslim communities, was obtained by the European Jewish Congress early last week.

Highlights of report

The report, which was prompted by a wave of anti-Semitic incidents in Europe that intensified in the spring of 2002, was released by the European Jewish Congress last Monday. Among its findings are:

- The incidents under examination "were tied to public discussion on the dividing line between legitimate criticism of Israeli government policy and anti-Semitic argumentation."
- In many cases, perpetrators of attacks could not be identified. But in cases where they could, the attacks "were committed above all either by right-wing extremists or radical Islamists or young Muslims mostly of Arab descent, who are often themselves potential victims of exclusion and racism."
- Attacks such as desecration of synagogues and Jewish cemeteries, painting of swastikas, sending of threatening and insulting mail, and Holocaust denial generally were attributable to the far-right.
- Physical attacks on Jews and the desecration and destruction of synagogues often were committed by young Muslims. Many of these attacks occurred during or after pro-Palestinian demonstrations, which also were used by radical Islamists for engaging in verbal abuse of Jews. In addition, radical Islamist groups were responsible for placing anti-Semitic propaganda on the Internet and in Arab-language media.
- At the extreme left-wing, anti-Semitic remarks were made at pro-Palestinian and anti-globalization rallies and in newspaper articles that used anti-Semitic stereotypes in criticizing Israel.

This combination of anti-Zionist and anti-American views formed an important element in the emergence of an anti-Semitic mood in Europe, the report found. Israel – portrayed as a capitalistic, imperialistic power – the "Zionist lobby," and the United States are depicted as evildoers in the Middle East and as a negative influence generally on world affairs.

More difficult to record and evaluate than "street-level violence" against Jews is "salon anti-Semitism," which is found in "the media, university common rooms and at dinner parties of the chattering classes," the report said.

In public debate on Israeli politics, individuals who are not politically active and do not belong to the far-left or far-right often voice latent anti-Semitic attitudes, the report found. Opinion polls show that in some European countries, a large proportion of the population harbors anti-Semitic attitudes and views, but they usually remain latent.

Observers point to an "increasingly blatant anti-Semitic Arab and Muslim media," including audiotapes and sermons, in which the call is made to fight Israel and Jews across the world. Though leading Muslim organizations sometimes express opposition to such propaganda, calls for the use of violence are assumed to influence readers and listeners.

The report also discusses the media's possible influence on the escalation of anti-Semitic incidents. The question is whether such escalation is due merely to daily coverage of Israeli-Palestinian violence or whether the reporting itself had an anti-Semitic bias.

One study on the quality of German press concluded that the reporting concentrated greatly on Israeli military actions and was not free of anti-Semitic clichés, but negative views also were applied to Palestinians. The report on Austria found anti-Semitic allusions in the far-right press.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, some Europeans argued that Islamist terrorism was a natural consequence of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, for which they held Israel alone responsible. They also believe Jews have a major influence on America's allegedly biased, pro-Israel policies.

This nexus is where anti-American and anti-Semitic attitudes could converge and conspiracy theories about "Jewish world domination" could flare up again, the report said.

The assumption of close ties between the United States and Israel provides further incentive for harboring anti-Semitic attitudes. Especially on the political left, anti-Americanism is closely bound up with anti-Zionism. Additionally, dovish activists, globalization opponents and some Third World countries view Israel as aggressive, imperialist and colonialist.

Such criticism is not necessarily anti-Semitic, but the report found that there are exaggerated formulations in which criticism of Israel crosses the line into anti-Semitism, such as when Israel and the Jews are accused of replicating Nazi crimes.

The tradition of demonizing Jews is in some sense now being transferred to the State of Israel, the report found. In this way, traditional anti-Semitism is translated into a new, seemingly more legitimate form, which could become part of the political mainstream in Europe.

The report said, "It can be said that the threatening nature of the situation, in particular for the Jewish communities, arose because in most of the countries monitored the increasing number of anti-Semitic attacks, committed frequently by young Arabs/Muslims and by far-right extremists, was accompanied by a sharp criticism of Israeli politics across the entire political spectrum, a criticism that in some cases employed anti-Semitic stereotypes."

Educational campaigns targeting Muslims, which include such arguments as burning "a synagogue is like burning a mosque," have encouraged dialogue, the report said.

Israel will co-operate with int'l court on security fence

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will co-operate with the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in the Hague if the United Nations General Assembly votes Monday to refer the issue of the West Bank separation fence to the court, and will argue that the decision to build the barrier was based on self-defence.

The decision was taken earlier Monday in a meeting between Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom. The two decided to wait for the outcome of the vote before taking any action, but it was agreed that if the ICJ is asked to render an opinion on the fence's legality, Israel will posit that the barrier is legal and stands up to all standards of judicial scrutiny.

The General Assembly is slated to vote on a Palestinian draft resolution "to request that the International Court of Justice issue an advisory opinion on the legal ramifications arising from the construction of the separation fence by Israel, the occupying force in the occupied Palestinian territories."

The Foreign Ministry says the resolution will be approved by the "automatic majority" the Arabs enjoy at the United Nations. Israel has tried to persuade European countries to join the United States in opposing the resolution, but has achieved only partial success. Opposition by EU nations would still be insufficient to defeat the resolution, but it would weaken its diplomatic legitimacy.

The Foreign Ministry contends that the construction of the separation barrier does not violate international law, even though its path extends beyond the Green Line.

"Every occupying power has the right to build fortifications and fences in the occupied territory when there is a military need for this," a senior ministry source says. "When there is terror, no one can argue that there is no military need for a fence. It might raise humanitarian problems that need to be solved, but there is no question of legality here."

Despite this assessment, Israel is not anxious to submit such political issues before international bodies, which are always suspected of favouring the Arab side and harbouring hostility toward Israel's case. In his efforts to block this resolution, Shalom also warned that transferring the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to international adjudication would eviscerate the road map peace plan.

The ICJ was established in 1946 and serves two roles: adjudicating conflicts between two states that agree to accept its authority, and handing down legal opinions upon request of the UN and other international bodies. The court's rulings only have advisory status; they are not binding upon the groups that request these rulings. But in some cases, it may be decided in advance to regard the court's ruling as binding.

If the Palestinian resolution is approved, as expected, and the fence issue is referred to the ICJ for discussion, the court will ask the relevant parties to submit written and oral statements, and then deliberate behind closed doors. The Foreign Ministry says this process would last for at least a year. Meanwhile, the Palestinians would have achieved their goal of embarrassing Israel.

The ICJ operates separately from the International Criminal Court (ICC), which was established to judge war crimes. There is no connection between the two international courts – except for the fact that both are located in The Hague.

The UN appoints 15 judges to the IJC, who each serve a nine-year term. Their mandate is to rule independently, and not represent their particular country. Currently, there are judges from Egypt and Jordan on the IJC, as well as judges from France, China, Japan, Madagascar, Slovakia, Germany, Sierra Leone, Russian Federation, United Kingdom, Venezuela, Netherlands, Brazil and the United States. The court registrar is from Belgium and his deputy is French.

The ICJ does not have a particularly busy schedule. Since it was founded nearly six decades ago, it has issued just 77 rulings on conflicts between states, plus 24 advisory opinions. It currently has 22 cases in its docket. Some of these cases followed wars in Africa and Yugoslavia. Most deal with territorial disputes (for example, a dispute over territorial waters between Nicaragua and Colombia) and issues of criminal jurisdiction between countries. (Mexico, for example, has appealed to the court in an effort to block the United States from carrying out the death penalty against 54 Mexican citizens.)

Israel has little experience with the IJC. It approached the court in 1957 to pursue a claim against Bulgaria, after an El Al plane was shot down over the eastern bloc country two years earlier. But the case was dismissed because Bulgaria was not willing to accept the court's authority.

Soft Cool Blox 'the perfect size for little kids' hands'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Stubbing his toe on a bedpost several years ago turned out to be a life-altering incident for Thornhill resident Wayne Levy.

"That mini-accident led to the launching of Cool Blox, brightly coloured, inter-locking foam blocks for children," said Levy, the father of two small children.

After stubbing his toe, Levy said, he began thinking about creating foam bumpers for beds, and although that idea was already taken, "I became immersed in the world of foam."

He spoke to his friend Johnson Kong about it, and as it turned out, Kong had begun thinking about the need for soft building toys after his kids created a fort out of pillows.

The two friends joined forces, and after two years, came up with Cool Blox, a child-friendly, vibrant coloured toy for children four and over, made out of zotefoam, a chemical-free, high-grade, high-density foam.

"It was a group effort. Johnson had the idea for a safe clubhouse, I had researched the foam, and we had an engineer design the angles and fit of the blocks.

"After the toy was fine-tuned, we checked its safety with Health Canada and then applied it to the real world. We had kids test it out in my basement 'lab,' and they all said 'cool,'" Levy said.

"There is no other product around that allows kids to make soft, enclosed structures. No matter what kids do with the blocks, no one gets hurt."

They launched their product at the Canadian Toy Fair last winter, and since then it has been named one of the 10 best toys and one of the top 100 children's products for 2003 by Stevanne Auerbach, also known as "Dr. Toy," a U.S. expert on play toys and children's products.

The blocks, which are manufactured by Universal Products Canada in Concord, "are the perfect size for little kids' hands," Levy said.

They come in four different packages: a 52-piece starter set, a 78-piece builder set, a 104-piece master builder set and a 340-piece clubhouse/fort kit.

The pair, who are "thinking into 2006," are planning "Cool Blox mini" made out of smaller blocks, and a Cool Blox car.

"We would like to come out with a new product every six months," Levy said.

The toy industry in the United States, is a "more than $21-billion industry, and it's hard for little guys like us to break in. We're getting the word out, however, because there is nothing like us. We were at the American International Toy Fair in New York last winter, and out of the 1,500 booths no one had anything like Cool Blox," he said.

The blocks have garnered a fair amount of attention. "Ontario Place has a Cool Blox play place, and we have been shown in the background on television shows such as Reba and Yes, Dear," he said.

"Product placement plants seeds in peoples' heads. It's a good way to reach out to the mass market," he said.

For information on purchasing Cool Blox, visit www.coolblox.com.

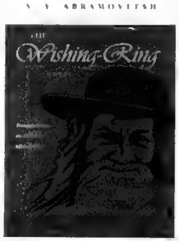
The Wishing-Ring, by S.Y. Abramovitsh, translated by Michael Wex (Syracuse University Press)



Toronto Yiddishist Michael Wex has produced an enticingly readable English translation of the important Yiddish novel Dos Vintshfingerl by S. Y. Abramovitsh (1836-1917), the beloved patriarch of Yiddish and Hebrew literature also known as Mendele Moykher Sforim.

Those familiar with Abramovitsh's fiction know it can be quite primitive with a lot of rough edges, as befits the work of a true literary pioneer. These qualities aside, The Wishing-Ring also offers much wonderful satire and humour which, as an editorial note promises, will leave the reader "gasping with admiration and laughter."

The novel explores the fates of the many 19th-century Russian Jews who were forced by poverty and other dire circumstances to leave their homes. At its heart is a coming-of-age story told by Hershl, who leaves his shtetl to become educated, only to return as an adult in the wake of the pogroms of 1881. Much of the action takes place in the village of Kaptsansk (Poorsville) and the larger town of Glupsk (city of fools).

Abramovitsh published the first version of the book as a slim Yiddish treatise in 1865, and later reworked it as the much larger Hebrew novel Emek ha-Bakha (In The Vale of Tears), which became immensely popular throughout the Jewish world after it appeared in 1888.

Critic Dovid Frishman, a young contemporary of Abramovitsh, said of Dos Vintshfingerl that its portrayal of Jewish society seemed astonishingly complete.

"Were a flood to wipe away everything but this book, we could reconstruct the general picture of Jews and Jewish life in the Russian shtetl in the first half of the 19th century on its basis," Frishman wrote.

A "great epic of Jewish life" is how historian Simon Dubnov described the book.

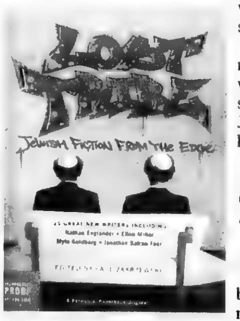
No Star Too Beautiful, edited and translated by Joachim Neugroschel (W.W. Norton & Co.)

This historical survey of Yiddish literature presents an anthology of stories from 1382 to the present.



It may come as a surprise to many readers that Neugroschel found so many rare and interesting items representing the so-called Old Yiddish period, long before the language's three patriarchs – Mendel Moykher Sforim, I. L. Peretz, and Sholom Aleichem – transformed their beloved mother tongue into a viable and expressive literary language. This is new ground almost entirely neglected by previous anthologists such as Irving Howe and Eliezer Greenberg, whose ever-popular Treasury of Yiddish Stories is 50 years old this year.

Filling almost 700 pages, this bountiful anthology also offers a sprinkling of chassidic tales and stories of the Haskalah before moving on to the main section on modernism.

Many expected voices are here, from Sholem Asch to Isaac Bashevis Singer, but so too are a delightful variety of more obscure names. Where else, for instance, might one encounter a story by Yudl Rosenberg (1860-1935), a former chief rabbi of Montreal and Mordechai Richler's grandfather? The anthology is further enhanced by inclusions from two more noteworthy Canadian writers, Yehuda Elberg and Chava Rosenfarb.

Lost Tribe: Jewish Fiction from the Edge, edited by Paul Zakrzewski (HarperCollins)

This up-to-the-minute anthology of "Jewish fiction from the edge" offers selections from 25 authors on the cutting-edge of everything fresh and different in Jewish fiction since Philip Roth shocked readers with Portnoy's Complaint more than a generation ago.

Nathan Englander, Jonathan Safran Foer, Myla Goldberg, Dara Horn, Tova Mirvis, Gary Shteyngart and Aryeh Lev Stollman are among the contributors with recent attention-grabbing works to their credit.

Editor Paul Zakrzewski, a transplanted Torontonian now living in New York, assures us that each selected author has embarked on a "new direction" in Jewish fiction.

Not surprisingly, Safran Foer's contribution is the brilliant first chapter of his famous novel, Everything Is Illuminated, which caused a huge ripple of attention when first published in the New Yorker a few years back. Englander's contribution is a selection from his acclaimed short story collection, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges. Chapters from several other larger works are also presented.

This is the book to read for those who want a better understanding of where Jewish fiction is heading. .

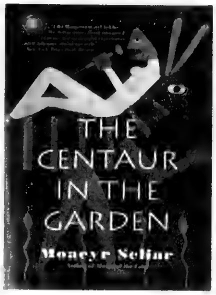
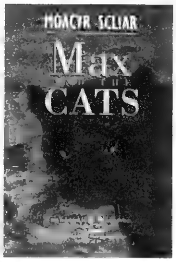
Max and the Cats/The Centaur in the Garden, Moacyr Scliar, (Key Porter Books)



Moacyr Scliar became the focus of much renewed interest last year after Montreal writer Yann Martel acknowledged that he had very roughly modelled his award-winning novel Life of Pi after one of the Brazilian writer's novels. For the most part, Scliar has enjoyed the compliment.

Translations of two of his novels – Max and the Cats (which inspired Martel) and The Centaur in the Garden – were recently published in trade paperback editions by Key Porter Books of Toronto.



The latter novel, which one might loosely describe as "magic realism with a yarmulke," seems to adhere to literary traditions fully in keeping with both Gabriel Garcia Marquez and Franz Kafka. At its centre is Guedali, a loving Jewish centaur, half man and half horse, who struggles with his problematic birthright and eventually escapes "in search of a place where his startling duality will be accepted and embraced."

Scliar has explained that he used the centaur as a metaphor of the Jewish experience. The book has been named as one of the 100 greatest works of modern Jewish literature by the National Yiddish Book Center.

Ruth Harriet Louise and Hollywood Glamour Photography by Robert Dance and Bruce Robertson (University of California Press)

Ruth Harriet Louise.

Ruth Harriet Louise, born Ruth Goldstein in 1903, almost single-handedly shaped the basic notions of stardom, glamour and fashion in Hollywood.

A forgotten figure today, her exquisitely lit, somewhat mannered photographs are immortal.

She was a young woman when Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, the influential Hollywood studio, hired her as a portrait photographer in 1925.

In a sterling five-year career, Louise photographed the stars of the day – Greta Garbo, Lon Chaney, John Gilbert, Joan Crawford, Marion Davies and Norma Shearer.

The photographs, which defined the idea of celebrity, were published in movie magazines and newspapers to the adulation of millions of Americans.

Louella Parsons, the quintessential Hollywood gossip columnist, wrote of her in 1929: "I have always said – and I still say it right out in print – that one of the finest photographers I know is a woman. I speak of Ruth Harriet Louise, who has made Marion Davies, Norma Shearer and other MGM beauties even more beautiful."

In Ruth Harriet Louise and Hollywood Glamour Photography, Robert Dance and Bruce Robertson pay tribute to her.

Their book, a mix of lucid text and alluring photography, is a veritable treat for the eyes and the mind.

Born in in New York City, she was the daughter of Rabbi Jacob Goldstein and his wife, Klara, both of whom were newly arrived immigrants.

Louise's brother, Mark, went to Hollywood in 1922 to find his fortune. He was drawn to California by the success of his cousin, Carmel Myers, an up-and-coming actress who would appear in the classic slient, Ben-Hur.

At his encouragement, Louise settled in Los Angeles as a portrait photographer, setting up shop at the corner of Hollywood and Vine.

Her first publicity photo, of starlet Vilma Banky, appeared in Photoplay magazine in September 1925. Shortly afterward, Myers introduced her to movie mogul Louis B. Mayer, who hired Louise to develop MGM's image.

According to the authors, Louise's photographs "played an integral role in the creation and promotion of stars."

During her relatively brief tenure at the studio, she was the most reproduced photographer in America.

Her most difficult subject was Garbo, the temperamental Swedish siren. The two worked together from the moment Garbo set foot at MGM through her rise to fame.

Greta Garbo, as photographed by Ruth Harriet Louise

For all her talents, Louise was given a pink slip and replaced by rival George Hurrell. She nevertheless continued working as an independent photographer. Her last session was with Anna Sten – Samuel Goldwyn's answer to Marlene Dietrich – in 1932.

Louise died in 1940 from complications of childbirth, but her legacy lives on, even as a footnote in Hollywood lore.

Ahead of Time by Ruth Gruber (Carroll & Graf)

American journalist Ruth Gruber, whose dispatches have often appeared in the Anglo-Jewish press, broke through the glass ceiling long before the vast majority of her contemporaries.

In the 1930s, when female reporters were usually confined to the "women's" pages of newspapers, Gruber was off in Europe as a foreign correspondent.

As a stringer for the New York Herald Tribune, she travelled around Europe and then, sitting in open cockpit seaplanes, she became the first reporter to reach the remote wastes of the Soviet Arctic.

She recalls these experiences in her engaging memoir, Ahead of Time.

A precocious student of English literature and German, Gruber was privileged to be selected for a one-year exchange fellowship at the University of Cologne in Germany.

Arriving in Cologne on the eve of Adolf Hitler's accession to power, she learned that one of her instructors was a world-famous scholar. Subsequently, he became a Nazi ideologue.

In this impressionistic book, Gruber charts the darkening atmosphere in pre-Nazi Germany. She recalls the anti-Semitic comments of a fellow student in a lecture hall and the street fighting that pitted communists against Nazis.

When Gruber graduated, she was only 20, the youngest PhD in Germany. Konrad Adenauer, then Cologne's mayor and later West Germany's first chancellor, personally congratulated her on her rare achievement.

Gruber left Germany in 1939 as a passenger on the St. Louis, a ship carrying about 1,000 Jewish refugees. The St. Louis achieved notoriety because it was turned away by Cuba and the United States and then sent back to Europe.

Returning to New York City, she discovered that her PhD was of no use in a saturated employment market shattered by the Depression. She applied for, and won, a grant to study women under fascism and communism in Europe.

Armed with press credentials from the Herald Tribune, Gruber roamed the continent as a freelancer.

Although her stories from Germany, Britain and Holland were of interest, Gruber's most unusual dispatches were from Stalin's Soviet Union.

A keen observer, she describes the port of Murmansk as "a still primitive Arctic city of 120,000, whose streets were dirt or planks of wood, and whose houses were weather-beaten cottages and huts."

The Siberian city of Irkutsk is a paradox. "Old dilapidated wooden cottages stood next to modern factories spewing black smoke… Sleepy horses dragged ancient carts on highways broad enough for army tanks."

And in the river port of Ust-Kut, when she is bombarded by swarms of huge mosquitoes, she observes: "Somewhere I had read that prisoners in Siberia were often abandoned in the forest and in a few hours died of mosquito bites."

Clearly, Gruber has a sharp eye for telling details, and in Ahead of Time, she makes the best of her travels through 1930s Europe and the Soviet Union.

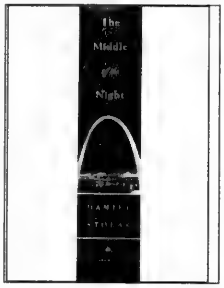
The Middle of the Night by Daniel Stolar, (Picador)

The eight short stories in Daniel Stolar's debut collection, The Middle of the Night, are well-crafted slice-of-life tales that deal with relationships and nostalgia.

Most of Stolar's characters are middle-aged and were raised in affluent, connected, liberal Jewish American households. A current crisis causes them to look back at the defining moments in their lives and at where they are now.



In "Jack Landers Is My Friend," the narrator, a happily married man, attends a school reunion where he reflects on his younger days, his friends, and considers the lure of infidelity with a woman he once loved but never pursued.

Infidelity is also a main theme in "Home in New Hampshire," where grown-up children go back to their country home for Thanksgiving, unaware of the guilt plaguing their father over his infidelity and their paralyzed mother's discovery of his unfaithfulness.

In "Marriage Lessons," also about marital and parental secrets, a young woman raised by a single mother spends much of her life trying to find out who her father is.

All of the stories deal with relationships – between husband and wife, old friends, parents and children. The characters look back with regret, imagining a life that could have been, the choices they could have made.

Stolar's characters are believable and his stories intelligently written, if perhaps a bit too dark for some tastes. It is an excellent debut.

Songa's Story: How A Shtetl Jew Found the American Dream by Natalie Green Giles with Betty Ajces, (iUniverse)

Many accounts of Holocaust survivors tell of brave, resilient people who survived the camps through courage and adaptability or because they were hidden by Righteous Gentiles.

But few stories tell of survivors who lived through the Holocaust by fighting the Germans in the streets of Stalingrad and getting their chance to take revenge on the Nazis.

Songa's Story, Natalie Green Giles' account of her uncle Songa's survival, is like a Russian version of Band of Brothers. While that TV series followed an American unit through its paces liberating western Europe, this book follows Green Giles' uncle's life in the Soviet Red Army from the start of the war to the liberation of Berlin.

Lazar "Songa" Ajces, born in a shtetl along the Polish/Ukrainian border, was drafted into the Red Army after Josef Stalin occupied eastern Poland as part of the secret deal he made with Adolf Hitler in 1939.

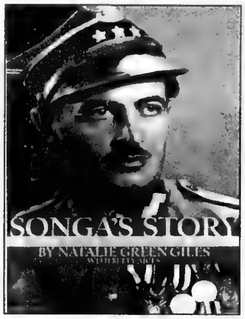
This saved Songa from the fate that befell the Jews after the Germans broke their agreement with Stalin and invaded the Soviet Union in 1941.

At the time, anti-Semitism was not prevalent in the Red Army (this would follow after the war) and Songa rose through the ranks to become a lieutenant. He was on the disorganized front lines at the start of the invasion and in 1942 fought in Stalingrad, one of the greatest battles of World War II, and the beginning of the end for Hitler's "1,000-year" reich.

When Songa's division was later overrun by a counter-attacking German army, Songa was arrested by the NKVD (the predecessor to the KGB). Such was Stalin's paranoia at the time that all soldiers who were captured or retreated without orders were deemed traitors.

Songa was taken to a camp east of the Urals and physically and psychologically tortured to admit he was a traitor. But he held out and was eventually released, though not long after he was again picked up for desertion. Eventually, he was exonerated and returned to his own unit.

Songa's tale is one of bravery and courage despite the obstacles thrown in his path. But Green Giles doesn't hide away from one aspect that other writers, in describing the heroics of their relatives, might shy away from: in his zeal to strike back at the Nazis who killed his remaining family, Songa orchestrated a "take no prisoners" policy in his unit.



It is well-documented that at the end of the war, many Germans would rather surrender to the Allies than to the Soviets. In Songa's case, this fear was justified. He instructed his men to kill all Germans who were captured. It is rather brave of the author to include this in her book.

Songa's Story is an engrossing read, told as though Green Giles were sitting in your living room telling you the story.

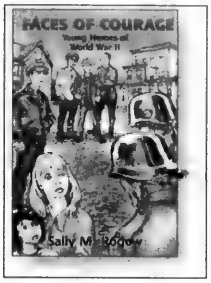
Faces of Courage: Young Heroes of World War II by Sally M. Rogow, (Granville Island Publishing)

Stories of courage in the face of insurmountable opposition always make for good stories. This is especially true when the heroes and heroines are children and teenagers.

Faces of Courage by Sally M. Rogow is a collection of 12 stories of children in Nazi-occupied Europe and Germany who risked their lives to save others.



Jacques was a blind 17-year-old in Paris who formed a resistance movement against the Germans. Together with others his age, Jacques distributed anti-Nazi newspapers across the city, and later across France.

Kirsten was a Danish teenager who helped rescue a group of Jewish teenagers by smuggling them to a port, where they were whisked off to safety in neutral Sweden.

This book makes an excellent gift for teenagers. It is highly inspiring.

Veteran actor regrets role in Gospel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

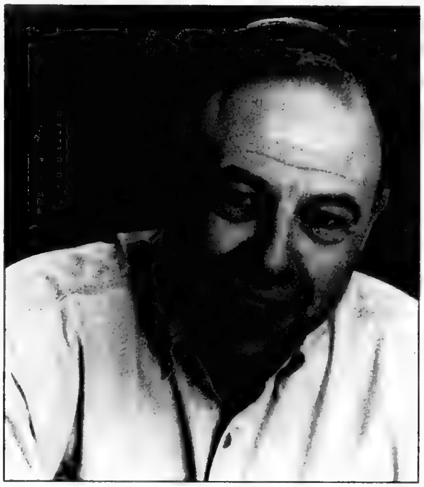
Perhaps you saw him as Herr Schultz, a Jewish merchant in the musical Cabaret, currently nearing the end of its run at Toronto's New Yorker Theatre.

Or perhaps you saw him as Lazar Wolf, the aging butcher who wants to marry Tevye's daughter in Fiddler On The Roof, a role he's taken on twice during his 30-year acting career.

As a veteran of more than 100 productions in film, television and stage, Toronto-area actor-director Allan Price speaks proudly of most of the roles he's taken on, which include that of Willy Loman in a recent notable production of Death of a Salesman in North York.

But he speaks less positively about his recent portrayal of the father of a blind beggar in the recent Garth Drabinsky-produced film The Gospel of John. Although he appears on-screen for only a couple of minutes, Price told The CJN he regrets his involvement in the film because he feels it has Anti-Semitic elements that he didn't recognize beforehand.

"I didn't see it coming because you couldn't have seen it by reading the script," he said. "It was the story of Christ but you can't always tell how the final film is going to look or feel. And I just didn't feel very positive about it after seeing it."



Allan Price

According to Price, the film portrayed Jewish leaders as "dark and sinister" and the followers of Christ as "the good guys."

The film has generated a variety of responses in these pages. It contains "every aspect of the Gospel that has generated anti-Semitism over centuries," wrote Paul Shaviv in a critique on Nov. 6, while Michael Coren wrote on Nov. 27 that he was "moved to tears by its sensitivity, faithfulness and sheer beauty."

For Price, however, who teaches English part-time at a midtown yeshiva, the film evokes negative stereotypes that may reinforce anti-Semitic prejudice in some minds.

"The film very clearly portrays the Jews as being responsible for Christ's death" and may give some people "a reason to be anti-Semitic," he said.

Price's Gospel appearance is just one of many film appearances he's made over the years, including significant parts in two schlocky early-1970s films, Cannibal Girls and Foxy Lady, that "jump-started" the career of legendary Hollywood director Ivan Reitman.

Once, during an appearance by Reitman on The Tonight Show, host Johnny Carson aired a segment of Cannibal Girls featuring Price. "That was kind of my claim to fame, I guess," the actor mused.

Becoming a regular early in his career on the CBC-TV comedy series The Hart and Lorne Terrific Hour brought him into contact with lawyer Hart Pomerantz as well as Lorne Michaels, who went on to found Saturday Night Live. It also brought him into contact with a troupe of performers, including Gilda Radner, Dan Ackroyd, Eugene Levy and Andrea Martin, who would later become legendary.

More recent roles include a part in the TV-film The Piano Man's Daughter and an appearance on Queer As Folk, a TV series about gay life. He also played a headache sufferer in an Aspirin commercial that is currently airing. (In order to raise a family, Price has also taken roles in the business world, far from the spotlight, including that of production manager for a furniture company.)

A veteran of many classic musicals from Guys And Dolls to The Wizard of Oz, he prides himself as an expert in the Broadway musical, and maintains a website – www. broadwaymelody.ca – in which he offers to share his knowledge and invites people to try to stump him.

He offers regular sing-along classes in the Broadway Melody on Monday evenings in a central location in Thornhill. There are several classes left in the current session and the next one begins Jan. 12. Visit his website for details.

Jewison, in The Statement, tackles French wartime racism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Norman Jewison's unambiguous empathy for victims of oppression shines through his latest film.

Due to open in Toronto on Dec. 12, The Statement is a political thriller adapted from a book by Irish-Canadian novelist Brian Moore. It turns on a war criminal complicit in the execution of seven Jewish civilians during the Holocaust.

Starring Michael Caine as a Frenchman eluding justice and Tilda Swinton as a judge tirelessly pursuing him, the two-hour Canadian movie is basically about betrayal.

"It's a theme that has always interested me," said Jewison – one of Hollywood's most accomplished directors – in an interview last week.

More specifically, Jewison, who was born and raised in Toronto, explained , The Statement implicitly deals with Vichy France's betrayal of its Jewish citizens.

Jewison, whose films have won 12 Academy Awards in 28 years, is no stranger to this incendiary theme.

In his 1967 Oscar winner, In The Heat of the Night, Jewison fearlessly tackled the subject of discrimination in Mississippi.

Three years later, in Fiddler on the Roof, his empathetic portrayal of a Jewish family in a Russian shtetl battling persecution and pogroms, Jewison yet again used betrayal as a broad theme.

And now, in The Statement, he has come full circle.

Jewison, who describes himself as a storyteller, has always been attracted to scripts that touch him on an intellectual and emotional level.

And in this respect, The Statement, which Jewison co-produced with Robert Lantos, was a perfect fit.

Jewison's affinity for the underdog is hardly accidental.

His Jewish-sounding name notwithstanding, Jewison hails from a long line of British Methodists. But when he was a boy, he was subjected to cruel taunts by peers who bombarded him with such timeless epithets as "Jewboy" and "Jewy."

As he tells it, he was blissfully unaware of his Christian background until he was seven or eight years old.

His best friend back then was a Jew who invited Jewison to synagogue services and seders. "I thought I was Jewish," he said in all seriousness.

Having been exposed to Jewish customs and traditions, Jewison was quite shocked when, on his first trip to New York City in the 1950s to pursue a budding career as a television director and producer, his agent asked him a pointed question.

"He said, 'Have you ever thought of changing your name? Jewison sounds a little too Jewish.'"

Norman Jewison on the set of The Statement.

Telling this story, Jewison's eyes widened incredulously. "I looked at him and said, 'Larry, you're Jewish.'"

The next morning, Jewison met with his agent again. "I'll change my name to Irving Christiansen," Jewison countered in jest.

The agent immediately understood. Jewison had no intention of capitulating to society's demand for conformity. "Why would I want to change my name?"

These brushes with racism, both overt and subtle, left Jewison wondering whether his family was of Jewish origin. "Maybe I was Jewish? Maybe we came from Spain?"

Piqued by curiosity, Jewison hired a researcher to solve the puzzle. He traced Jewison's family's lineage in Yorkshire all the way back to 1116. "He couldn't find a single Jew," noted Jewison.

Though he settled the conundrum of his ancestry for once and for all, Jewison's hurtful encounters with prejudice definitely influenced him as a filmmaker.

As Lantos put it, "He is a brilliant, visual (director) with political awareness and a social conscience. He makes thought-provoking movies for mainstream audiences. He was exactly right for The Statement."

Discussing the film, which cost about $30 million to produce, Jewison said, "It's a hell of a good story, suffused with a lot of moral consciousness."

Its message is crystal clear. "People should be responsible for what they do," he said, referring to Pierre Brossard, the film's central character. "There should be no pardon for crimes against humanity."

In his view, Brossard is modelled after Paul Touvier, the war criminal pardoned by then French president Maurice Pompidou.

As part of his preparations for The Statement, Jewison hired a researcher to study France's collaboration with Nazi Germany.

The researcher found a disturbing photograph of seven corpses crumpled beside a wall in a French village where Touvier had been seen in the company of German soldiers.

He also discovered that the bodies were those of Jews who had been shot in cold blood.

Jewison replicated this incident in The Statement. For Jewison, the process of selecting extras to play the seven doomed Jewish hostages was a chilling one. To achieve the desired level of authenticity, Jewison separated Jewish extras from non-Jewish ones.

But by separating Jews from Christians, he was jolted into the realization that he, a liberal, had inadvertently emulated the villains, the Nazis.

"I almost started crying. That, to me, was the most difficult moment in the film."

In his opinion, the murder of Jews in Vichy France was not a topic to which Hollywood studios would have been drawn. Nor would they have felt comfortable with the notion that Brossard was protected by certain elements in the Catholic church and high government officials.

Jewison acknowledged that The Statement may not be particularly commercial, disclosing that Lantos ran into problems when he was raising funds for it. "We passed the hat around."

Commercial considerations, however, were not Jewison's top priority. "I wanted to make a film that captures the imagination and raises ideas."

He is not bothered in the least by the possibility that The Statement may alienate some viewers.

"I hope it offends some people. It's always better to make a film that challenges somebody. The truth always upsets somebody."

Nevertheless, Jewison is pleased that it will be distributed in France.

Lawyer takes a stab at justice system in his book

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

A prominent Toronto law professor is calling his first book a "professional suicide note."

Alan Young is not spouting hyperbole. In Justice Defiled: Perverts, Potheads, Serial Killers & Lawyers (Key Porter Books), he blasts the justice system for failing society by wasting court time on harmless offences and taking the law away from the community.

"We hate criminal justice… because it has demonstrated absolutely no interest in acquiring even a kernel of insight into predatory crime, and remains impotent to curb the tide of modern, senseless violence," Young writes.

In an interview in his University of Toronto office, the former lawyer explains why he wrote the book.

"You can only knock your head against the wall so long before it starts to bleed," he said, wearing a shirt emblazoned with The Simpsons. "I find everything about the profession to be destructive to the human spirit."

Young said he has come a long way from his days at Associated Hebrew Day School in Toronto. After law school and 18 years of legal practice, he is known for his pro-pot work and his tireless battle to help the disenfranchised.

A glance at his career spotlights his successes: he was responsible for establishing a medicinal marijuana program in Canada; free-speech advocates praised him for defending booksellers interested in selling weed magazines and albums by controversial rap group 2 live Crew; and he co-founded the Innocence Project at Osgoode Hall, an organization that investigates wrongful convictions. In his pro bono work, he has defended everyone from fetishists to hash dealers to AIDS patients.

Alan Young: "Issues of misplaced priorities."

"We have issues of misplaced priorities," he said, his hands dancing as he spoke. "We criminalize pleasures like pot-smoking and prostitution, which draws money away from dealing with serious crime." Around 75 per cent of court time is clogged with minor offences, he said.

Young would also like to see the justice system take power away from legal professionals and put it back into the hands of community representatives. A reliance on lawyers to solve problems is dangerous, he cautioned.

"Lawyers treat clients as case numbers. They should learn bedside manners, and they should learn to get their hands dirty dealing with human conflict."

He prefers the European criminal justice system. In Germany, for example, jurors work for four years to develop expertise on legal matters.

"I don't like our jury system of pulling names out of a hat," Young said, "asking these people who know nothing about law to come up with an informed verdict, and ending up with nothing learned about the process."

His book will undoubtedly raise the ire of legal professionals across the country – especially with a chapter on law school titled "The Training and Education of Mr. Bastard." Young predicts only half of all lawyers will stick up for him, even though "every lawyer has felt my frustration."

Targeting justice may be unwise for a law professor, but Young is an educator who is outspoken and honest. Former students regularly work with him, citing his intelligent oratory skills as an appealing talent.

"He can easily adapt to any audience," said Toronto lawyer Paul Burstein, adding that Young's range of knowledge stems from his eclectic reading – from Nietzsche to Lenny Bruce to Martin Booth's History of Cannabis.

Recently, Young has not attracted media coverage just for his controversial book. He regularly defends marijuana activists who seek to decriminalize the plant.

"I'm glad I essentially converted the federal government into a drug trafficker," he said. He went to bat for AIDS patient Jim Wakeford in 1999, and started several "compassion clubs" in Toronto since that landmark ruling.

Young's media-spotlight reputation, coupled with his public complaints about Canadian justice will likely cloud legal minds. "I'm not entering a courtroom again," he said, explaining that his fiery pages won't ever grant him a blank slate in court.

"There is nothing more dangerous than giving raw power to people who think they are smarter than they are," he writes in one passage on judges.

He smiled somewhat mischievously. "You think a judge will ever regard me in the same light?"

Then he became serious and proffered Justice Defiled's other raison d'être.

"This book is important to me, because I want to establish credibility as a good writer."

BETH TZEDEC HOSTS TRIBUTE TO ARTIST-WRITER BRUNO SCHULZ

Beth Tzedec's Max and Beatrice Wolfe Library is co-sponsoring an evening of tribute to Bruno Schulz (1892-1942), an extraordinary writer and artist from Galicia who is sometimes compared to Franz Kafka and considered a major influence on several modern Jewish writers.

Having hovered like a ghost in the dim recesses of Jewish cultural awareness for nearly six decades, Schulz came suddenly to prominence three years ago after several of his fanciful wartime murals were uncovered in his native town of Drohobycz (formerly in Poland, now Ukraine).

Schulz had painted the murals for a Nazi officer in exchange for an assurance of protection. The arrangement ended brutally when his protector murdered the Jewish dentist of a fellow Nazi officer, who took revenge by shooting Schulz summarily in the street. "You killed my Jew – I killed yours," the officer later explained.

Two years ago, representatives of Yad Vashem visited Drohobycz and by diligent sleuthing, found the house and room where Schulz's paintings had been hidden beneath coats of whitewash for nearly 60 years.

Then, claiming they had received permission from municipal authorities, they paid $100 to the homeowner, removed the murals and took them to Israel. The tactic caused an uproar throughout the artistic world that was reported on the front page of the New York Times.

Schulz's published collections of short stories have established him as a pioneer of the magical, absurd and surrealistic. Unfortunately, the manuscript of a 1938 novel called Messiah has been lost. Philip Roth, Cynthia Ozick, A. B. Yehoshua and other contemporary scribes have based works fully or partly on his legend.

Schulz "is a leading figure in modernism," said Beth Tzedec librarian Zina Glassman, who organized the tribute. It is being co-sponsored by the Polish Consulate, the Goethe Institut and the centre for Jewish studies at York University.

Presenters include York professor Carol Zemel, Holocaust Centre director Adam Fuerstenberg and singer-artist Gloria Valentine. Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum is moderator. The program also includes a short film-clip from a recent documentary about Schulz and the pilfered Drohobycz murals.

Phoenix: a Russian theatre that offers special performances

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

When Shabbat draws to an end, families have many choices for Saturday night entertainment including restaurants, movies, concerts, performances, visiting friends. However, for a memorable evening with your children, you might want to attend the play I Ought To Be In Pictures.

The play will be performed Dec. 13 at 8 p.m. and Dec. 20 at 7 p.m. at St. Vladimir Institute, 620 Spadina Ave. This is a new, English-language production presented by Phoenix Cultural Diversity Theatre, a Russian community troupe.

In Russian mythology, the Phoenix was a magical bird of happiness that was said to have lived 500 or 600 years by repeatedly burning itself to ashes on a funeral pyre and rising again from the ashes for another life.

Artistic director Olga Chvedova and general manager Vladimir Milman founded the Phoenix in February 2002 to present Russian theatrical productions to North American audiences.

The Phoenix is the first Russian community theatre to offer productions in two languages, Russian and English.

I Ought To Be In Pictures, by Tony Award-winning playwright Neil Simon, is a touching story about a child searching for a missing parent, and what happens when they finally meet.

Chvedova said she selected this play because "it can find a response in the heart of every audience member."

She added that the subject matter is universal, and that an insight into parent-child interaction always draws empathy and attention from an audience. Chvedova often mentions her loving relationship with her Jewish father, who strongly encouraged her to pursue a career in theatrical arts.

I Ought To Be In Pictures involves a cast of only three actors, but it is definitely the power of three that lights up the stage. The entire play takes place in one room, which allows the audience to concentrate on the communication between the characters and their emotional reactions to each other. Minimalist decor and subtle lighting further enable the audience to fully comprehend facial expressions and body language.

The actors themselves say this play is dynamic, as there is always something happening on the stage. It is fast-paced to keep the audience's full attention.

I Ought To Be In Pictures features local talent. Phoenix actor Jane Milman is a young student and the daughter of Vladimir Milman, co-founder of the theatre. She performs the part of Libby, the headstrong young girl whose search for her father, a show business entrepreneur, yields unexpected results. Jane Milman captures the essence of an abandoned daughter who arises like an apparition before her unsuspecting father. Her character is filled with a desire to love, and Milman adds a touching innocence to the entire picture.

Stefan Genyk-Berezowskyj plays the part of Herb, Libby's estranged father. A multi-talented individual who works on OMNI Television, Genyk-Berezowskyj participates in many Phoenix productions.

His character, Herb, is a selfish man, who left his family 16 years earlier and barely remembered his kids' names when Libby suddenly walks into his life. He rarely expresses affection for anyone, even his longtime girlfriend, Steffy. But when Libby walks through his door, his transformation begins. Herb's kindness and warm-hearted nature begin to shine through on the stage, as his character evolves from the world's most selfish man to a loving and caring father.

Gianeya Nesterova plays Herb's "evil" girlfriend, Steffy. At least this is how Libby envisions Steffy before she learns how lonely and unappreciated Steffy really is. Only through observing Steffy's search for happiness and seeing her hopes crushed is Libby able to cope with Herb's behaviour. Nesterova captures the essence of a woman who desperately wants a place in Herb's heart. Yet, when Libby appears and Herb starts to care more and more about his daughter, Steffy becomes somewhat annoyed. This girl, a stranger, is competing with her for Herb's attention.

However, after Libby appears in Herb's life, Steffy begins to recognize how powerful his emotions can be. It is a complicated part, because the audience comes to see her character in a completely different light: Steffy evolves from a yearning woman to a jealous girlfriend and back again. Nesterova creates a brilliant, memorable image in her supporting role.

Genyk-Berezowskyj and Milman are appearing together again in the upcoming English-language Phoenix production of Sylvia, on Feb. 14, 2004.

For tickets and inquiries, call Phoenix general manager, Vladimir Milman at 416-633-7720 or 416-923-6641 ext.2654, or by e-mail: vmilman@oise.utoronto. For more information on Phoenix Theatre and upcoming events, visit www.torontobest.net/phoenix/home.html.

Q. I am a woman in my 30s with a young family, and I am concerned about our calcium intake. My husband and I do not consume very many dairy products. Should we take a calcium supplement? Is this as good as consuming dairy products?

A. You definitely both need calcium in your diet and you can get that calcium from a supplement, which can help prevent osteoporosis and bone loss. However, if you are able to consume dairy products, regular or lactose free, and can find something that you like – yogurt, milk, café au lait or chocolate milk – then I strongly urge you to go this route.

We are now learning that dairy products have many health benefits beyond those of calcium alone. Recent research shows that consuming two to three servings of dairy products per day tends to help reduce overall body weight, as well as percentage of body fat and fat around the abdomen in particular. Dairy intake also seems to be effective in establishing normal cholesterol levels and thereby reducing heart disease risk.

Q. I am reading a lot about the dangers of trans fats. Where are these fats found and what should I avoid?

A. Trans fats are a danger. They are fats created in the hydrogenation process used to turn liquid oils into hard fats, and we believe they play a role in heart disease when consumed in excess. These fats are found in many foods that we often perceive as healthier choices and many foods that children eat. I strongly suggest that you read labels and limit your family's intake of trans fats. Choose unhydrogenated margarines, avoid foods containing hydrogenated oils and shortenings. Avoid palm and coconut oils. Watch for these fats in soft, chewy snacks like granola bars, cereal bars, microwave popcorn (even light), fried and baked snack foods, cookies and baked goods, cereals, crackers, soft taco shells, frozen desserts and many more. A good way to avoid these is to choose natural foods that often use less of these ingredients or bake cookies from scratch using non-hydrogenated margarine.

AT THE POST: Frank Stronach, chairman of Magna International and Sydney Cooper, businessman and philanthropist, teamed up to host a dinner in honour of the Reena Foundation and people with developmental disabilities. Thoroughbred horse racing was the theme of the evening, underscoring the huge interest and involvement by both Stronach and Cooper in the field. These two giants of industry and the equine world turned their attention for the evening to helping Reena kick off its fundraising campaign to build an ElderHome for seniors with developmental disabilities. Seen with Stronach (middle) and Cooper (left) is renowned Irish tenor, John McDermott.

Cantor, Dubinsky realized the 'impossible' dream

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Noah Cantor and Steve Dubinsky grew up in Conservative Jewish homes dreaming the impossible dream – a career as professional athletes.

Neither was the most talented in his field of play, but through hard work, dedication and passion for their sports, both carved out nearly decade-long careers that fill them with pride.

Having originally met as kids at Camp B'nai Brith in Ottawa, Cantor, a Toronto Argonauts defensive tackle and nine-year veteran of the CFL, and Dubinsky, a 10-year NHLer forced into retirement by a concussion, renewed acquaintances last month as part of Holy Blossom Temple's lecture series for young adults titled "My Story: For the love of the game."

Michael Landsberg, host of TSN's Off The Record, moderated the question and answer session that followed the athletes' introductory remarks on the roles of Judaism and sports in their lives.

The Ottawa-born Cantor talked of his family's reaction when he told them he had a high school game on Kol Nidre night, but would see them in synagogue the next day. Suffice it to say, his suggestion did not go over well, and Cantor was in shul, not on the gridiron, that night.

When he was at St. Mary's University, the 6-foot-4, 264-pound lineman later sat out a game that also fell on Yom Kippur. The Catholic school's coaches made certain not to schedule a game on that day the following season.

In fact, the only two games Cantor has missed during his professional career were Yom Kippur in 1997 and 2000.

Cantor was signed by the Argos to a two-year-plus-a-team-option deal last February after spending the previous five seasons with the B.C. Lions. He won his third Grey Cup ring with the Lions in 2000 after winning back-to-back titles as an Argo in 1996 and 1997.

"I knew when my time was up in B.C. where else to come, where I would be comfortable [and] be with coaches and players I knew already," said Cantor, who originally signed as a free agent with Toronto prior to the 1995 season. Cantor spent the first three years of his career in Double Blue.

"It felt like coming home and it was an easy choice."

Cantor recently returned to the West Coast to prepare for life after football, where he has established a partnership in the restaurant business with his friend, Gerald Tritt.

Dubinsky, an 11th round pick of the Chicago Blackhawks in the 1990 entry draft, suffered a concussion last February, which abruptly ended his playing career. It took four months for his head to clear after he was caught with a stick to the side of his helmet while taking a guy to the net.

The Montreal native has no regrets and is thankful for his time in the game because, as a kid, he never thought making it to the NHL was a realistic possibility.

"I was never the top player on any teams growing up," said the 6-foot, 190-pound forward, who played four years of U.S. college hockey at Clarkson University as a walk-on.

"I stress the fact of how hard I worked on a daily basis and it was a matter of being in the right place at the right time and taking advantage of opportunities," he said.

Dubinsky said he was never in a position to ask for time off for Jewish holidays because his place in the lineup was often tenuous at best.

The 33-year-old had 25 goals and 45 assists in 376 career NHL games, which included stints in Calgary, Nashville and St. Louis. And while Dubinsky says he did his time in the minors, he is proud he never spent a full season with a farm club.

He played in all 82 games with Chicago in 1997-98, notching career highs with five goals and 13 assists.

Dubinsky currently heads up the American hockey operations for Cardinal Sports Management, a leading recruiting service for college and university athletic programs in the United States and Canada.

He also serves as a studio analyst for Blackhawks games broadcast on Fox Sportsnet.

"I'm happy where my life is right now," said Dubinsky, whose wife is expecting their third son in May. "It's kind of been a nice transition for me."

Former army sniper wins world blind golf title

By BARRY DAVIS
Special to The CJN

CAESAREA — Try doing something mundane, like stretching out your hand to pick up a cup of coffee from your breakfast table. Now, try it with your eyes shut and you'll get some idea of what 50-year-old world and Israeli champion golfer Zohar Sharon has to contend with every day of his life.

Twenty-five years ago, Sharon was an active young man who worked as an explosives expert with the Israeli Defence Forces. On one fateful mission, a bomb he was attempting to defuse blew up in his face. He lost his sight in one eye while the other eye was also damaged. Within two years, he was totally blind.

He was devastated.

"There were times in my life when I thought of committing suicide," said Sharon during a meeting in the café of the swanky Caesarea Golf Club in northern Israel. "I had some desperate moments."

Three years ago the names Jack Nicklaus or Tiger Woods meant little or nothing to Sharon. But four months ago he was a member of the winning team at the Israeli National Pairs Golf Championships – for golfers with normal vision – and just about two months ago he won the World Blind Golf Championship in Scotland.

That, in itself, is a remarkable achievement for someone who had never previously set foot on a golf course. With Sharon's physical disability taken into consideration, those sporting pinnacles take on gargantuan proportions.

So how does he do it? As far as Sharon is concerned, it all boils down to work, work and more work.

"You've just got be dedicated, that's all. You've got to put the hours in."

These days, he spends up to 10 hours a day on the fairways and greens at Caesarea, honing his swing and putting action.

Sharon adds that the skills he acquired as a sniper before his accident now come in very handy.

"I was a very good sniper, and even won a few championships; I have a sharpshooter's sense of direction. With golf, it's a matter of training and iron will."

Prior to taking up golf, Sharon immersed himself in painting. It became an obsession and after giving it up cold turkey, it took a while for Sharon to find another pursuit. "Then one day someone came to the house and saw me just sitting around doing nothing," he recalled. "He suggested I try a bit of home putting and he got me a putter and made a hole in a shoe box."

Sharon was soon holing his putts from a distance of 15 feet.

"I didn't have much else to do so I played all day and all night," he said.

A few months later, a friend saw him in action and put him in touch with Caesarea Golf Club manager Alon Ben David. Sharon soon swapped his floor tiles for the lush grass of the Caesarea fairways and, under the guidance of caddy Shimson Levy, Sharon's career began to take off.

Sharon recently added another award to his increasingly crowded trophy case when he was named Israel's Sports Personality of the Year.

Unassuming as he is effusive, Sharon says he didn't expect to win at all.

"I didn't take the whole idea of being a nominee for Sports Personality of the Year seriously. I was amazed when I was chosen."

In fact, Sharon insists in keeping a tight handle on his ego.

"I learned a long time ago never to let your successes and the kudos go to your head. If you start thinking 'me, me, me' you lose it. Before you know it, someone else will have taken your place and you'll just be yesterday's news."

אל תשלח ידך אל-הנער: שירים ודברי הגות על העקדה. ליקט וערך: אריה בן-גוריון. כתר הוצאה לאור.

דרשתו של ס. יזהר מתוך ״ימי צקלג״ זועקת נגד ניסויים של אהבה והדרישה הזאת להוכחת אהבה. ״מה זכותו שלו (של אברהם) על יצחק. שיעקוד את עצמו!״

יש המדגישים את נקודת ראותה של האם. ״...אך שרה היא לא השלימה, אך שרה היא לא אפשה. דם הבן זעק אל אמא, ולשמעו פרחה נפשה. אב ובן וכרוב שמים - לא פקחה עוד העינים״ (ש. שלום). סבלה אומר דוד צימרמן בכתבתו, כלולה בשתיקתו של יצחק.

״התמה העקדה?״ שואל אברהם שלונסקי; ״מה ברכה אשאג אז אל ליל ומה הקללה - איש לא ידע.״ יצחק למדן סבור שלא, לא תמה העקדה; ״יפה כלנו עקדנו ובו ידינו הבאנו הלום העצים, ואל שאל וחקר אם תרצה העולה! ודאי ישנו אבא הרוצה בכך, ודאי ישנה אמא אשר לא תשכחנו - נפשיל, אפוא, דומם צואר על המזבח: אצלנו -״.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

May a departing employee compete directly with his former firm?

Jewish law has long recognized the advantages of a competitive marketplace and therefore places few restrictions on entrepreneurs. Thus, you may open a pizza shop next door to a pre-existing one or set up a law office down the hall from your competition.

While some authorities limit this freedom to situations where the market is large enough to support multiple businesses, many allow for competition even when the market is such that one (or both) of the firms is destined to go out of business. Certainly, in a large metropolitan area, all are welcome to open competing businesses.

Nonetheless, employees who leave their firm to strike out on their own – a fairly common occurrence – must ensure they do not run afoul of several moral exhortations.

While you may welcome former clients who seek out your "new services" you would not be permitted to make any attempt to solicit their business, notwithstanding the fact that you may have been solely responsible for the account for many years. These clients belong to the firm and attempting to lure them away would run afoul of the prohibition against exploiting the efforts and/or assets of others for personal gain. A fine line but one that may not be crossed.

Similarly, any unique "trade secrets" developed by the former firm may not be used in your new business. Furthermore, you may not take key employees with you. To do so is not considered fair competition but rather directly raiding and damaging the competition, something Jewish law prohibits.

Thus, enlisting a head hunter to attempt to lure the key players in, for example, a rival's legal department would appear to be prohibited.

The Talmud labels one who "snatches away the anticipated gains of others" a rasha, an evil person. Many rabbinic authorities, in applying this dictum to the modern workplace, prohibit the stealing of longstanding clients of rival firms. This applies to all competitors, not just former employees, and would proscribe unsolicited bids for clients, even if such bids were to offer cost savings. But you may do generic advertising, hoping that some may recognize your talents and voluntarily choose your services.

Wine Down Easy Co-Chairs: Paula Klaiman and Raina Silverberg

Heather Gotlieb, President, Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary and Max Gotlieb of Cassels, Brock & Blackwell LLP, evening sponsors

On November 19th, 2003, the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary held its 3rd annual "Wine Down Easy" event at Easy and the Fifth.

The sold out event consisted of a rare and vintage wine silent auction, wine tasting, a martini bar, dinner, dancing and the best networking in town! There was something for everyone!

Event co-chairs, Paula Klaiman and Raina Silverberg, along with Vice-President Anna Koffler, President Heather Gotlieb and their incredible committee did an outstanding job of ensuring the success of the evening. All proceeds went to the Auxiliary pledge for The Centre of Excellence in Mothers' and Infants' Health. Martin names federal cabinet

Major Jewish representation

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Not since the Trudeau era some 20 years ago have three Jews become members of a federal cabinet.

At the swearing-in ceremony of new Prime Minister Paul Martin's cabinet last Friday, Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler was named justice minister and attorney general, while Montreal-area MP Jacques Saada, a francophone, was appointed leader of the government in the House of Commons and minister responsible for democratic reform, and longtime B.C. senator Jacob (Jack) Austin became government leader in the Senate.

Saada, the least known of the three, was born in Tunisia and was first elected to the House of Commons in 1997. Since January 2001, he has been deputy whip of the government. He has also been chair of the Canadian section of the Canada-U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defence since 1998. He had been parliamentary secretary to former solicitor general Andy Scott.

Jacques Saada

Saada, 56, represents Brossard-La Prairie, a mainly francophone riding on the South Shore of Montreal with no more than a couple of dozen Jewish families. He left Tunisia in 1958 for France, where he became a member of the socialist Zionist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair. In the Six Day War in 1967, he volunteered in the Israeli army and then spent a year living on a kibbutz.

Churches condemn anti-Semitism

Jewish leaders praise 'forceful' statement

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jewish leaders have welcomed a groundbreaking statement by the leaders of Canada's largest Christian churches, who have joined to strenuously condemn anti-Semitism and to invite all Canadians to fight it.

"We challenge all churches, parishes, congregations and people of goodwill to find ways and means to expose and eradicate anti-Semitism within and from Canadian society," the Christian leaders stated in an open letter released Dec. 8 through the 17-member Canadian Council of Churches.

"We must not be silent."

Individual Canadian churches have spoken out against anti-Semitism before, while others have expressed anti-Israel sentiment. But this is thought to be the first time Christian leaders have made a sweeping statement that represents more than 20 million Canadians.

The letter is signed by the heads of the Roman Catholic, Anglican, United, Presbyterian and five other national churches. It was released to coincide with the Dec. 10 anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and just ahead of the Dec. 19 start of Chanukah.

The church leaders said they have become "profoundly concerned and deeply dismayed" by the sharp rise of anti-Semitism in Canada.

They also acknowledged "with sadness and regret, and with no little shame, the historic burden of persecution… all too often inflicted by Christians who have maligned Jesus' own people in Jesus' name."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Anti-Hate Program

REGINA — Students and teachers here took part earlier this month in a conference on preventing racism organized jointly by the Beth Jacob Synagogue and the File Hills Qu'Appelle Tribal Council, an aboriginal group, and co-sponsored by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. A year ago, Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew was roundly criticized for remarks he made praising Adolf Hitler. "Rather than taking action against someone like David Ahenakew, we are going to work with the youth of our city and with our communities to develop understanding, respect and ultimately acceptance," organizer Jeremy Parnes told CBC.

ISRAEL

Tibetans in Israel

JERUSALEM — Tibetans are visiting Israel to learn about agriculture. Some 37 Tibetans recently completed a training program in Israel's southern desert, and 50 more will arrive next month. A group known as the Israeli Friends of Tibetan People is sponsoring the program.

Gere'd Up for Peace

JERUSALEM — Actor Richard Gere visited Israel and the West Bank last week on a three-day private peacemaking visit. A longtime campaigner against China's occupation of Tibet, he met with Israeli settlers and later with Palestinians in Ramallah before touring Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity. Gere, on his second round of grassroots meetings in the Middle East during the Palestinian intifadah, also toured Jerusalem's Old City and visited the Western Wall.

Hamas Wins Vote

RAMALLAH — Hamas was the big winner in West Bank student elections following a campaign touting terrorist attacks. In voting at Bir Zeit University in Ramallah, Hamas took 25 out of 51 seats; Fatah won 20. In previous votes, Hamas earned a two-seat margin over Fatah, the party of PA President Yasser Arafat. During the campaign, Fatah blew up models of Jewish settlements and Hamas blew up models of Israeli buses. At one debate, a Hamas candidate bragged about the number of "Zionists" killed by Hamas activists at Bir Zeit, while his opponent boasted Fatah had also killed its share of Jews.

Dreidel Spinning Record

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — Students at Indiana University set an unofficial record for dreidel spinning last week. As the school's fight song played over loudspeakers in the background, 713 dreidels were spun for 10 seconds, a record pending confirmation by the Guinness Book of World Records. The previous mark was set at the University of Maryland.

Touchdowns for Allah?

IRVINE, Calif. — The names of some teams in an upcoming Muslim football tournament in California are causing controversy. Jewish leaders are protesting after some of the teams in the Jan. 4 tournament chose names such as Intifadah, Soldiers of Allah and Mujahadeen, or Holy Warrior. "A lot of the kids on our team are from Palestinian origin," Associated Press quoted Tarek Shawkya, the captain of the Intifadah team, as saying. "We are in solidarity with people in the uprising." Rabbi Bernie King, who lives in Irvine, where the tournament is being held, said the team names undermined those who worked for closer relations with Muslims.

Anti-Semitism in Oz

SYDNEY — Australia experienced its highest number of anti-Semitic harassments on the street, as well as graffiti and threatening e-mails, in the year ending Sept. 30, says Australia's main Jewish group. "There is plenty of evidence that the Middle East situation was used as a tool to express anti-Semitic hatred," said Jeremy Jones, head of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry.

Krusty Becomes a Man

NEW YORK — Krusty the Clown, of Simpsons fame, has had a belated bar mitzvah. On an episode last Sunday of the popular FOX cartoon show, Krusty learned that he is not on the Jewish Walk of Fame because he did not have a bar mitzvah. To rectify the problem, Krusty reads from the Torah under the tutelage of his father, a rabbi voiced by comedian Jackie Mason.

JTA Journalist Dies

NEW YORK — The Jewish Telegraphic Agency's former bureau chief in Washington, D.C., David Friedman, died Dec. 2 at 68 after a long illness. Friedman was JTA's Washington bureau chief from 1981 until he retired in 1992. During that time, he covered such news events as Israel's war in Lebanon and the first intifadah.

Hitler Wine a Big Seller

UDINE, Italy — Christmas sales of an Italian wine with a picture of Adolf Hitler on the bottle are "through the roof," its maker says, thanks to attempts by Belgium and Germany to ban its importation. Alessandro Lunardelli said he has already made a fortune from his "Fuehrerwein" since introducing it in 1995 as part of a line with labels showing historical figures such as Napoleon, Mussolini, Stalin, Lenin and Che Guevara. He said the inclusion of prominent Communists shows he's not promoting fascism with the Hitler wine.

Prof Says He 'Regrets' Remarks About Jews

TORONTO — A Trent University professor accused of publishing anti-Semitic statements online has sent a letter of regret to the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, after four months of discussion between the university and CJC.

In a letter to Congress, Michael Neumann said he regrets the remarks attributed to him in an e-mail exchange with the Jewish Tribal Review Web site, which links to other sites with articles on "Jewish influence" and "Jewish power."

In the exchange, revealed last summer, Neumann is quoted as saying that "my sole concern is indeed to help the Palestinians and I try to play for keeps. I am not interested in the truth, or justice, or understanding, or anything else, except so far as it serves that purpose."

In his letter to CJC, Neumann said he does not "encourage, condone or participate in racist rhetoric or the targeting of any community based on race, religion and other prohibited grounds."

Ontario chair Ed Morgan said CJC, which had complained to Trent president Bonnie Patterson about Neumann, is "prepared to accept Mr. Neumann's letter of regret, but the sting of his words against our community may be hard to forget."

In a joint statement with CJC, Patterson said "the statements attributed to Mr. Neumann, while not done in his capacity as an academic at Trent University, were nonetheless perceived by some as being offensive and unacceptable… We have indicated to [him] that the university's commitment to the pursuit of academic truth remains paramount in everything we do."

Ontario Liberals blasted for retroactive repeal of tax credit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Two Jewish organizations reserved unusually harsh words for the Ontario government for its retroactive repeal of the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC): Harsh, punitive, unheard of, unfair and even mean.

Appearing before the standing committee on finance and economics last week, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) blasted the new Liberal administration of Dalton McGuinty for clawing back the popular tax credit retroactively to Jan. 1, 2003.

Privately, Jewish officials say the public hearings on Bill 2 are merely window dressing, as the government intends to pass the measure before Dec. 31 so the law can be enforced for the current tax year.

The bill took even CJC by surprise, Ontario region director Bernie Farber and public policy director Simon Rosenblum said in a submission to committee members.

"Parents made decisions to enroll their children in our day schools in good faith," they said. "Now they are being told – retroactively – that the 2003 tuition payments made well in advance of your government coming into office will not be eligible for the tax credit.

"These parents are, for the most part, middle and low income earners and will be paying a stiff price for a decision that they could in no way have predicted at the time of enrolling their students in religious day schools. Without prejudice to the larger issues surrounding the tax credit, to cancel it in such a retroactive manner seems to us to be most unfair and mean-spirited."

Congress said it had hoped – "and believed we had a right to expect" – that a "reasonable alternative" to the tax credit would have been put forward by the government before the measure was repealed.

Congress had kept a close watch on an attempt

Books

From the editor's desk

Despite the turbulence of events shaking the Middle East, seemingly without cease, and despite the stories occasionally stirring local newsrooms as well, it is important that we not forget some of the other details of Jewish life, in which, were we to look more often, we might see more evidence of the angels working on God's divine architecture.

As most readers of this column know, The CJN has placed great emphasis in recent months on fostering interest in "Jewish" writing – that is, writing by Jews and about Jewish themes.

We will continue to do so in the coming months as well because Jewish writing is one of the treasured repositories of undiscovered "details" of Jewish life.

I close out the calendar year, therefore, by drawing readers' attention to another relatively new, fine work: Yiddish: A Nation of Words by Miriam Weinstein, (Ballantine Books, 2002).

This book is more about the history of the people who have spoken and still speak Yiddish than about the language itself.

But Weinstein is not a historian. She is a documentary filmmaker and journalist. As a result, the work breezes along at a swift pace. Some of the chapters end as if they were serial installments in a tense novel, leaving the reader to earnestly anticipate the subsequent chapter.

Weinstein brings a journalist's talent for research and a deft, felicitous use of language to the subject, which is obviously very important to her.

Weinstein makes no claim to scholarliness. The text is not footnoted. Nor is scholarship, for its own sake, the aim of the work. "This is a story that begs to be told," she writes in her introduction.

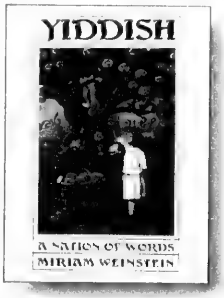
Weinstein wishes to bring the story of the relationship between the language and the people to the younger generations for whom, increasingly, the sound of the Yiddish will be nothing but an interactive experience in a Jewish museum.

"This book requires nothing more than an open heart and a curious mind," Weinstein writes.

"For me, this tale qualifies as a miracle. A language is born in shadow with the lowliest of aims – only for women, only for the untutored, only for ordinary, workaday use. Yet that very dailiness and lack of expectation allow it to grow. It expands, sweet and light as a New Year's honey cake…"

But if Weinstein is not a historian, she is a master of metaphor:

"European Jews were all too aware that they could find themselves without warning on the brink of drowning. Their only sure protection was maintaining the communal boat. The Yiddish language became the caulk that kept the water out and the passengers dry."



Similarly, Weinstein is very skilled at synthesizing disparate historical pieces of information into cogent, compelling theses.

Her book unfolds chronologically as well as geographically. It features biographical sketches of many of the key figures of European Jewish history. Her treatment of the 1917 Russian Revolution is especially instructive.

True to her subject, Weinstein's canvas of Yiddish evokes both laughter and tears. I recommend the book heartily.

Each week, we receive inquiries from the public seeking information about various Jewish institutions. To answer those questions, we turn to Canadian Jewish Directory by Edmond Y. Lipsitz, published Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem, in association with J.E.S.L. Educational Products. It is the most authoritative of such works available in Canada and is updated regularly. It is a useful reference book at home or at work and is available in all local Jewish bookstores.

Matti Baranovski killers seek shorter jail term

Lawyers representing Lee Cochrane, one of two young men convicted of beating Matti Baranovski to death, are asking that their client be jailed for only 12 to 18 months in addition to the four years he has already spent in custody.

Crown calls for life sentences for Cochrane, Mariani

The Crown has asked Judge David McCombs to jail Cochrane and Meir Mariani for life with no parole for seven years, the Toronto Sun reported.

Cochrane and Mariani were part of a group of masked youths who beat and kicked Baranovski to death in November 1999 when he refused to hand over his cigarettes.

They were charged with second degree murder but convicted in July of manslaughter.

Cochrane's and Mariani's lawyers argued that time served before conviction is considered double a post-conviction sentence, so the four years already served is the equivalent of an eight-year sentence. Manslaughter convictions in Ontario usually carry a seven-year sentence, they said.

Prosecutors argued the three years the pair spent in youth detention should get single credit and only the one year in an adult facility should be doubled.

Crown lawyers have also argued the two men, now 20, suffer from mental disorders and would prove a danger if released. They pointed to a psychiatric report from 2000 which said the two have conduct disorders.

Matti Baranovski

Defence lawyers countered by arguing the report is out of date. They argued psychological evidence indicated their clients are now only a low to low-moderate risk to re-offend.

Evidence at the sentencing hearing showed both Cochrane and Mariani have shown remorse, while a psychiatrist testified that Cochrane told him he had cried himself to sleep over the crime.

Neither man testified at trial or at the sentencing hearing.

Israel Bonds, Toronto Symphony Orchestra team up

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel Bonds has embarked on a first-ever marketing effort in the arts community, joining forces with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) to promote contributions of Bonds to the orchestra's endowment fund in exchange for a variety of special privileges.

But public response so far has been modest.

Donations to the TSO through the program have been less than hoped for, said Anne-Marie Wilson, the orchestra's chief financial officer and assistant treasurer. The program began in mid-November after most people had already made charitable contributions.

"People are inundated with things to do," she said.

Under the agreement, designated donations to the orchestra made by year's end would be used to purchase Israel Bonds. Matching funds from the Ministry of Culture, administered by the Ontario Arts Council Foundation, would also go toward the purchase of Bonds.

When the program was proposed by TSO chair Hershell Ezrin, it was anticipated that both organizations would benefit, Wilson said.

Elan Levitan, national communications director of Israel Bonds, said the project falls within Bonds' "double mitzvah program" approach that has been used to sell Bonds for years.

Both organizations benefit, as does the Bonds purchaser, who receives a charitable receipt for his or her contribution. That sort of arrangement has been used to aid various Jewish charities and Gilda's Club of Greater Toronto, Levitan said.

"The double mitzvah program is widespread and ongoing. It's not unique other than it's the first time we've linked up with the arts community."

Wilson said the TSO hopes to use the assets raised from the campaign to boost its endowment fund, which stands at $18-$20 million. Income from the fund goes toward the orchestra's operating expenses. The Bonds approach was particularly attractive to the TSO because it was hoped to spur additional contributions at a time when soliciting capital donations has become increasingly difficult and competitive.

Depending on the size of their donation, contributors would receive advanced buying privileges and the right to attend otherwise exclusive receptions with musical artists.

Although the Ministry's pledge to match contributions expires on Dec. 31, the TSO is hoping the current Ontario government will extend the program. If it does, the orchestra would likely start an advertising campaign earlier in the year before people have decided on their annual charitable donations, Wilson said.

CJC blasts Liberals

to legally block the government from proceeding on the bill. But earlier this month, a judge of the Ontario Superior Court denied an injunction sought by the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools.

The CJC officials blasted the Liberals for cancelling the credit retroactive to 10 months before the government assumed office.

"Elementary fairness would tell us that there is something very wrong with changing the rules so that the previous actions of taxpayers – based on the rules in place at that time – are penalized.

"How in the world can citizens/taxpayers be expected to act in good faith with the law of the land when a government is permitted not only to change the rules – which of course is, in general, perfectly acceptable – but to change those rules retroactively?"

Congress said it has "every expectation" the committee will advise McGuinty, finance minister Greg Sorbara and the cabinet to reverse the way in which the EETC was cancelled.

OAJDS co-presidents Ira Walfish and Aaron Blumenfeld noted in their submission that the majority of religious school parents represent lower and middle income families "who struggle to make tuition payments."

The retroactive elimination of the EETC "creates significant financial hardship for parents. It is punitive and unfair," they said.

Parents paid for tuition in August 2002 and August 2003, before the election, and relied on the anticipated partial refund of tuition money through the EETC, Walfish and Blumenfeld explained.

"If the EETC is repealed retroactively, parents are out-of-pocket for a refund they expected to receive under a law that was in place when they made their schooling decision."

They estimated that parents will lose up to $1,400 in 2003 and $2,100 in 2004, or between $6,800 and $8,400 in a family of four children, and that the cost of cancelling the tax credit is roughly $30 million in 2003.

Walfish and Blumenfeld warned that it would cost Ontario the same amount – $30 million – if just nine per cent of students in religious schools were forced to enter the public school system because their families could not afford tuition.

"If more than nine per cent of the students leave, the decision to repeal the EETC retroactively could cost the Ontario government money," they added.

They noted that two per cent of Ontario's children are enrolled in unfunded faith-based schools, and that not funding "the two per cent religious minority is discriminatory."

They suggested more time is needed to develop alternatives to the tax credit, and that a repeal date of June 30, 200[illegible] would "show goodwill on the part of the government to work towards a solution to the issue of minority religious school funding."

U.S. students called 'ignorant' about Israel, Judaism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The new president of Yeshiva University in New York, Richard Joel, has issued a lament about Jewish university students in the United States.

The vast majority are "colossally ignorant" about the Jewish world and have never visited Israel, Joel said in an interview during a recent trip to Toronto.

Yet there have never been as many pro-Israel activists on campus as there are today, said Joel, who until recently was president and international director of Hillel, the international Jewish students organization. He took up his newest post last June.

As he put it: "There is a strong sense of Israel advocacy on campus."

At the same time, Joel acknowledged, a few American universities, such as San Francisco State, have been swept by "a plague" of anti-Israel rhetoric that has morphed into sheer anti-Semitism in some instances.

But in general, American campuses are friendly to Jews and Israel.

A former assistant district attorney in New York, Joel, 53, said he is pleased by the fact that not a single university has joined the pro-Arab campaign to divest itself of Israeli investments.

"That's the real story."

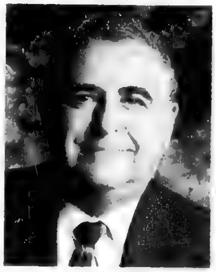
Most Jewish university students lack a knowledge of Israel and Jewish history and tradition because they are "the products of a very weak Jewish education," he said. "If a student is not proudly Jewish, he won't care about Israel."

Joel praised the Birthright program, which sends Jewish students to Israel on free trips, as "unbelievably effective in enhancing Jewish identity and forging closer ties to Israel."

Jewish students, he said, should be armed with "key principles" when defending the Jewish state. They should know that Israel is the sole democracy in the Middle East and that it guarantees religious freedom to all its citizens.

They should also know that Israel yearns for peace but has yet to find a suitable Palestinian negotiating partner.

Joel urged Jewish schools, clubs, organizations and summer camps to inculcate a love of and appreciation for Israel in their programs, and said the Jewish home should be a "bastion" of Jewish customs and values.



Richard Joel

Joel called the international academic boycott against Israel "uncivilized," but said it has not gained any substantial ground in the United States.

"There is strong support for Israel in the Bush administration and among most Americans," he said.

He disagreed with a recent claim by U.S. financier George Soros that the current Israeli and U.S. governments have contributed to the recent global upsurge of anti-Semitism.

"Jews don't create anti-Semitism. Anti-Semites do. Soros should look at Jewish history. I don't agree with him, but he's entitled to his perspective, no matter how misbegotten."

In his view, American Jews have never been as well-off as they are now.

"For the first time in the United States, being Jewish is an option rather than a condition," he said.

But mixed marriages are a serious symptom of ignorance and assimilation.

"We are being loved to death," he quipped, referring to the melting-pot idea in American society.

"Ignorance is the enemy with a capital I."

The intermarriage rate is remarkably low among Jewish day school graduates, he said. "Jewish is the sea in which they swim."

Joel believes the lack of awareness of Jewish roots, rather than the existence of anti-Semitism, is the primary challenge facing American Jews.

"As Rabbi [Joseph] Soloveichik said, the Jewish people were created for more than fighting anti-Semitism. This is a master principle."

He disagreeed with the conventional wisdom that a chasm divides Orthodox and secular American Jews. "We live in different worlds, but I wouldn't say it's a chasm. We're estranged, though we're not a family of strangers."

In a reference to a report released by the United Jewish Communities' National Jewish Population Survey last September, Joel agreed that a growing number of American Jews are communally and religiously unaffiliated.

By the same token, the Orthodox community is thriving and American Jewish life has never been as vigorous in terms of Torah study and dedication to Judaism, he said.

Joel urged observant Jews to engage secular Jews to ensure "they're out there strengthening klal Yisrael." Some traditional Jews are reaching out to secular Jews, but others are retreating into "self-sustaining communities."

Joel said donors in Toronto have established a fund to send Canadian educators to Yeshiva University to pursue masters' degrees in Jewish education during their summer breaks.

With about 7,000 students, Yeshiva University offers undergraduate and postgraduate degrees in a variety of disciplines from history and English literature to medicine and corporate finance.

With hopes high

Last week Paul Martin Jr. was sworn in as Canada's 21st prime minister. It was the much anticipated culmination of the prolonged transition of power from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. After 10 years, there was a new decision-maker in Ottawa setting Canada's highest political priorities and agenda.

As befitted the occasion, the ceremony at Rideau Hall was marked by considerable circumstance and formality. One detail in particular, however, was especially moving, and perhaps especially revealing.

During the ceremony, our new prime minister held tightly onto the Canadian flag that had flown at half-mast when his father died some years before. When asked at a press conference about the significance of that gesture, the prime minister, overtaken by emotion, was unable to respond.

Carrying the flag was no mawkish, sentimental gesture. It was obviously an act of great personal reverence and deep filial piety on the part of the prime minister. Not only was it touching to witness, it was refreshing as well, perhaps the augary of an approach to public policy that will be grounded in definitive values and that understands the profound impact of public example upon national discourse and perhaps even behaviour.

We congratulate Prime Minister Martin and express the hope that he be granted the health, wisdom, courage and compassion to govern wisely. We also congratulate all the members of his cabinet and convey particularly proud expressions of congratulations to Senator Jack Austin and MPs Irwin Cotler and Jacques Saada, whom the prime minister has selected for ministerial responsibilities. May the deliberations of the new government advance the well-being of all Canadians and help bring peace and prosperity throughout the world.

In the end, he crawled out of a hole

Like most tyrants, bullies and thugs, Saddam Hussein, preferred to surrender rather than to resist. In the end, he simply crawled out of a hole. And as he was pulled up into the light of his captivity, he was treated by his captors in a manner that he and his regime denied to their own people: with civility and deference to the rule of law.

The rebuilding of Iraq will now go forward with renewed confidence. Saddam's confederates may still try to spill the blood of others onto Iraqi soil in the hope of demoralizing and destabilizing the coalition forces and the governing Iraqi council. But with the abject vanquishing of the tyrant, the new Iraq will rise faster. And with the image of a new Iraq taking clearer shape on the horizon, the sun will shine more brightly on the wider Middle East.

We owe Rabbi Plaut

I was deeply saddened to learn that Rabbi Gunther Plaut is not well enough to continue writing his CJN column ("Rabbi Plaut retires his CJN pen," CJN, Dec. 11). He always had something worth saying, and he said it well.

In his writings, Rabbi Plaut was not a confrontational Reform rabbi out to score partisan points for his brand of Judaism. He knew that what unites us as Jews is much greater than what separates us. His columns showed respect and concern for klal Yisrael – the whole Jewish community – whatever individual beliefs or practises may be. When we stood at Sinai, we were Jews, period – not Orthodox Jews, Conservative Jews, Reform Jews or Reconstructionist Jews.

As The CJN has pointed out, we owe Rabbi Plaut our gratitude. May God grant him a recovery and good health for the future.

McGuinty a man of his word?

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's Fiscal Responsibility Act 2003, which he introduced two weeks ago, was quickly given first reading.

Among the many tax-cut cancellations was the cancellation of the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), which, when fully enacted, would have provided more than $3,000 per child tax relief to parents who send their children to denominational schools in Ontario. In effect, the EETC ended the funding of one religion's educational institutions at the exclusion of all others.

McGuinty has not revealed any plan on behalf of his government to end this form of religious discrimination in the province.

To make matters even worse, the EETC was cancelled retroactively to Jan. 1, 2003. All other measures in this new act take effect Jan. 1, 2004 or later (such as change of electrical rates). The effect of this retroactivity will put many families into debt, as they counted on this tax relief when planning their budgets for the 2003-2004 school year.

McGuinty has backed off many of his election promises. Is this how he is showing he is "a man of his word?" What message is McGuinty sending to Ontario's Jewish population? Could this be political payback for many in our community who campaigned vociferously for the Tories and the tax credit in the past election?

Only he knows.

Churchill would roll over in his grave

Jews have become the "canaries in the coal mine" for all democratic liberal societies. Suicide bombs by Muslim extremists are indiscriminate, and the rising fifth column in Europe (and throughout the globe) of tainted, hate-filled Islamic supporters of theocracy, tyranny and jihad are looking for the weak underbelly of these western societies.

In large part, these jihad supporters are finding weaknesses in three disparate communities: latent and not-so-latent anti-Semites who are savouring the new de rigueur public, unapologetic Jew-bashing; the university intelligensia; and poor and not-so-poor disenfranchised immigrants.

Hatred makes strange bedfellows. Western elected officials fear losing an election more than they fear the future that awaits the consequences of the Trojan (Mohammedian?) horse of the Islamic electoral block.

Winston Churchill would roll in his grave if he saw this state of affairs in Europe and the United Kingdom.

Why do they always blame Sharon?

Let me see if I have this straight. Israeli journalist Hirsh Goodman blames Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for the failure of every democratic initiative designed to end the intifadah ("Israeli journalist slams Sharon's leadership," CJN Nov. 27). According to Goodman, Sharon failed to help former Palestinian prime minister Mahmoud Abbas strengthen his grip on power because Sharon did not release more prisoners. So, Goodman says, Sharon's refusal to fully comply with extraneous demands that are not even mentioned in the road map peace plan is far worse than Abbas' complete failure to comply with the first and most basic requirement of the road map. If Abbas had made any attempt at all to rein in terror groups – beyond a feeble ceasefire designed to give the terrorists time to regroup and refine their weaponry – then we might be seeing progress. Instead, some of the prisoners Sharon did release have rejoined the terror groups and continued in their attempts to sabotage not just future peace initiatives, but everything Israeli.

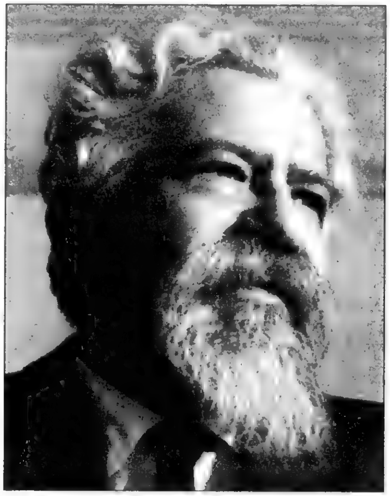
Awe and wonder: Abraham Joshua Heschel on education

By OTTO BARUCH RAND

Although Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel is mostly known as a theologian and philosopher, his vision of education is no less insightful and coherent than his vision of religion and piety. His views on education emerged from his main theological concern – seeking answers to man's ultimate questions.

But Heschel's interest in education was not just an adjunct to his work in theology. As a rabbi and a professor, not only did he consider himself first and foremost a teacher, he was called upon by the highest authorities of his country, including the president of the United States, to voice his views on educational challenges facing American youth.



Abraham Joshua Heschel

Because of his moral grandeur, he was a man presidents and even popes listened to. So did much of the Jewish establishment. He was often a keynote speaker when Jewish education was on the agenda. He spoke with candour and audacity about the failings of religious education in his time. Yet, like prophets in the days of old, he too concluded his chastisement with words of consolation and hope, providing guidelines for a brighter future. Many of his concerns for education are contained in articles collected in the volume The Insecurity of Freedom, but they are also an underlying theme in most of his writings.

In perceiving the world, Heschel saw three aspects that command our attention: its power, its beauty and its grandeur. Accordingly, he recognized three human responses to the world: exploiting it, enjoying it and accepting it in awe. While recognizing the need and the right given in biblical commandments to exploit nature and its resources to support life, he lamented that this has become the the modern human being's overwhelmingly dominant approach to nature, to the exclusion of the other two. "Our age is one in which the attainment of power, the utilization of its resources is taken to be the chief purpose of man in God's creation. Man has indeed become primarily a tool-making animal, and the world is now a gigantic tool box for the satisfaction of his needs."

Heschel believed the enjoyment of the world can be attained through love of nature and arts. He worried that young people of his generation substituted enjoyment for entertainment, thus becoming passive spectators rather than active participants in the joy of living. But his major concern was our loss of the ability to stand in awe, to wonder and to discover the sublime.

How can Heschel's concerns affect the education of our children? How can the schools improve on the failings he points out? "Our systems of education," he wrote in Children and Youth, "stress the importance of enabling the student to exploit the power aspect of reality. To some degree, they try to develop his ability to appreciate beauty. But there is no education for the sublime. We teach the children how to measure, how to weigh. We fail to teach them how to revere, how to sense wonder and awe… Yet without it, the world becomes flat and the soul a vacuum."

In God in Search of Man, Heschel noted that all truly creative thinking springs from the experience of awe. The core of Heschelian education – if I may coin such a term – must then be the development of the students' capacity to wonder and revere. Wondering is the act of seeing wonder – meaning miracles. Does it mean that we must constantly wait for miracles to happen? Heschel's answer is yes, but not for supernatural ones. We witness miracles around us daily. We need only to allow ourselves to recognize them as such. Heschel calls the art of seeing miracles "radical amazement." This refers, he wrote, "not only to what we see, but also to the very act of seeing as well as to our own selves, to the selves that see and are amazed at their ability to see."

The absence of wonder leads to taking things for granted, relying merely on reason to explain everything in the universe, as if reason itself would be a self-developed attribute, a plant that no one had planted. This approach is not only limited, but sinful, Heschel believed. "The surest way to suppress our ability to understand the meaning of God… is to take things for granted. Indifference to the sublime wonder of living is the root of sin." The blessings we recite every morning (birkot hashachar) remind us of the miracles of the daily reawakening. When recited by rote, they become another dull moment. When said with intent and comprehension, they open the gates of reverence and set our minds to the task of learning.

Of course, there must be a balance between using our intellect and appreciating the mystery of the world through wonder. Heschel himself warned: "The sense of wonder and transcendence must not become a cushion for the lazy intellect. It must not be a substitute for analysis where analysis is possible; it must not stifle doubt where doubt is legitimate. It must, however, remain a constant awareness if man is to remain true to the dignity of God's creation, because such awareness is the spring of all creative thinking."

Heschel teaches us that the cardinal requirement for maintaining the dignity of God's creation is upholding the dignity of the human being, young and old, healthy and ill, strong and weak, more capable and less capable. Heschel gave a strong rationale for this. He noted that upholding a child's – or an adult's – dignity is the key to unlocking human potential. The denial of dignity is abuse, because it puts a lock on human potential. This is certainly true in education. The teacher holds both the key and the lock, as well as the decision about which one to use.

"The basic dignity of man is not made up of his achievements, virtues or special talents. It is inherent in his very being," Heschel explained. A teacher must know that every student requires dignity. She cannot withhold it if she wants the student to attain his potential and open his eyes to the wonders of learning. "Great, therefore, must be our esteem for every man!" Heschel once wrote, and he offered Pirkei Avot 4:15 as further evidence – wise words that every teacher, parent and student should internalize: "Let the honour of your disciple be as dear to you as your own, let the regard for your colleague be like the reverence due to your teacher, and let the reverence for your teacher be like the reverence for God." If this value remains unheeded, it will lead to a catastrophe: "Holocausts are caused not only by atomic explosions. Holocausts are caused wherever a person is put to shame," Heschel wrote.

Because of his high regard for teachers, Heschel placed heavy demands on them. "The teacher is more than a technician. He is the representative as well as the interpreter of mankind's most sacred possessions." This places heavy responsibility on teachers' shoulders, and similarly on parents, who, in Judaism, are the primary teachers. It's not only a question of what information a teacher imparts, it's who he or she is. "It is the personality of the teacher which is the text the students read; the text that they will never forget," he said. That is, the teacher is the model that students emulate.

Heschel insisted on dignity and reverence for teachers. At the same time, he recognized it was not enough to demand reverence. It needed to be earned. This is also true of parents. Reverence is not unconditional. Heschel personalized this question: "The problem we face, the problem I as a father face, is why my child should revere me? Unless my child will sense in my personal existence acts and attitudes that evoke reverence – the ability to delay satisfactions, to overcome prejudices, to sense the holy, to strive for the noble – why should she revere me?"

Likewise, we as educators all need to ask why we are in the classroom. Is it only to make a living, to be professional explainers and demonstrators, or is it to fulfil a sacred duty of connecting present and past, of guiding the student to the fountains of meaning? According to Heschel, "everything depends on the person who stands in the… classroom. The teacher is not an automatic fountain from which intellectual beverages may be obtained. He is either a witness or a stranger. To guide a pupil into the promised land, he must have been there himself. When asking himself: 'Do I stand for what I teach? Do I believe what I say?' he must be able to answer in the affirmative."

Heschel deplored the quantitative orientation of education, because it's not the quantity of what is taught that matters but the love for learning. In this assumption, Heschel was criticizing educators who are hung up on achievement testing, because they miss the point. Material learned for exam expires with the exam. "If I understand correctly what goes on in our schools, the sequence seems to call for information to be digested by the students, questions presented by the teacher and answers to be supplied by the student. We evaluate the student by his ability to answer questions rather than to understand problems."

Heschel went further: "Learning, education, must not be equated with a curriculum we complete upon graduation… The meaning of existence is found in the experience of education. Termination of education is the beginning of despair." Heschel considered teaching to be about igniting a flame in students, and the teacher as kindling the spark.

In an address to the Rabbinical Assembly of America in 1962, Heschel told the following story, which uniquely summarizes his view of education:

"A young man once wanted to become a blacksmith. So he became an apprentice to a blacksmith, and he learned all the necessary techniques of the trade: how to hold the tongs, how to lift the sledge, how to smite the anvil, even how to blow the fire with the bellows. Having finished his apprenticeship, he was chosen to be employed as the smithy of the royal palace. However, the young man's delight soon came to an end when he discovered that he had failed to learn how to kindle a spark. All his handling the tools was of no avail."

Otto Baruch Rand was the founding principal of the Toronto Heschel School. He retired in 2001.

Living life, or killing time?

I never watch TV without holding a book. It's an odd habit that I trace to my days as a yeshiva student. At yeshiva, I learned that bittul zman, the wasting of time, is a cardinal sin. Time is much too valuable to squander, because it could be used for Torah study and mitzvot. So I learned to take enormous care with every moment, to the point that I rode the bus with a religious text in hand, never to waste time on idle daydreaming. Even now, years later, I am uncomfortable "wasting time" on something as frivolous as watching TV.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Yeshiva bochers are not the only ones concerned about time. Indeed, an entire time-management industry has emerged to help harried businessman schedule more meetings. The realization that "time is money" ensures that the sharp executive will do everything possible to maximize time. And because the technology-enabled entrepreneur is the contemporary hero, the tools of time management have filtered down throughout society. Even housewives and students carry daytimers and Palm Pilots.

But while we've learned how to manage time, we've forgotten why we're doing it. Yes, time is money, but frankly, it's a whole lot more. Time is life. Our lives are made up of a finite amount of days, hours and minutes. And unlike money, time is irretrievable.

Wasting time is aptly referred to as "killing time" because it is truly a loss of life.

But it's not only couch potatoes who kill time. One can kill time while being ostensibly busy. Indeed, some people are "urgency addicts," busying themselves with empty trivialities because they get a rush out of being busy. However, we can fill our calenders with "important" errands and meetings, yet still do nothing of consequence. A busy life is not always a meaningful life.

Benjamin Franklin may have coined the term "time is money," but he also had a spiritual view of time management. (Indeed, part of Franklin's autobiography was translated and included in Cheshbon Hanefesh, a popular Yeshiva text). Franklin believed that each morning a person should plan the day while thinking: "What good shall I do this day?" and at night, he should look back and ask: "What good have I done this day?"

Our contemporary daytimers are missing these two questions.

Even if our agendas are full, we still need to find time for the things that count. No matter how busy we are, there are always a few moments to learn, love, grow and care. We can always fit in a call to our parents, a hug for our children, a few words to cheer up a friend. Whether or not we squeeze the important things into our schedules determines if we are living life or killing time.

Jimmy in Geneva: pointing fingers in the wrong direction

Recently, when celebrating the signing of the "Geneva Accord," former U.S. president Jimmy Carter once again demonstrated the skills that earned him a Nobel Peace Prize. His speech was far tougher on Israel – and the United States – than it was on the Palestinians. Unfortunately, beating up your natural allies and buttering up democracy's enemies passes for courage in Carter's amoral universe – and has earned him glory worldwide.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Since leaving the White House in 1981, dialoguing with dictators has become his specialty. His turn-the-other-cheek diplomacy emphasizes reaching out to the world's outlaws – from North Korea to Syria, from Somali warlord Mohammad Farah Aidid to his buddy, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

For Carter, no autocrat is too heinous to woo. In his zeal to show tolerance for the terrible, Carter often disdains democrats. Such moral blindness masquerading as evenhandedness is his defining diplomatic tool. But it's not only morally questionable, it's counterproductive. Rationalizing terror and demonizing settlements only feeds Israeli insecurity and makes peace more elusive.

The most basic tenet in negotiation is that people compromise when they feel comfortable. A good mediator understands both sides' hopes and fears and learns how to satisfy enough of each side's desires without exacerbating insecurities.

Carter carefully soothed the Palestinians. He defined the conflict's "most critical issues" as a moderate Palestinian would, mentioning "border delineations, Israeli settlements, the excessive occupation of Palestinian lands, the future of Jerusalem and its holy places, and the extremely troubling question of Palestinian refugees."

Most Israelis would add terrorism and the Arab desire to exterminate Israel to that list, but Carter rationalized Palestinian violence while limiting responsibility for it by saying: "There are continuing violent attacks by Palestinian terrorist groups and increasingly harsh reprisals from Israel." That is, Israel the country is bad, but only Palestinian renegades are problematic.

Carter also excoriated Israel for "build[ing] an enormous barrier wall on Palestinian land" and ended his speech with two paragraphs attacking settlements – treating them as the main obstacle to peace – while devoting only two lines to the Palestinian need to "renounce violence," despite their decision to derail Oslo by turning away from negotiation and toward terror.

Carter also failed to address the other major Israeli insecurity and the Geneva Accord's greatest weakness. Most Israelis, who have consistently been willing to sacrifice land for peace, don't understand why this plan will work if Palestinians rejected compromise in 2000. Nevertheless, ignoring Arafat's post-Oslo campaign of incitement against Israel, Jews, and Zionism and oblivious to suicide bombs that killed hundreds of Israelis even before Arafat began his war against Oslo, Carter celebrated the days "after the Oslo agreement of 1993, and during and after the Palestinian elections of 1996" as "times when moderate leadership and sound judgment prevailed."

Carter also burnished his credentials as Europe's favourite American by claiming "the lack of real effort to resolve the Palestinian issue is a primary source of anti-American sentiment throughout the Middle East and a major incentive for terrorist activity." Yet, Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden made it clear in his 1998 fatwa declaring war on America that he cared more about the loss of Spain in 1492 to the "Crusaders" – meaning Christians like Carter – than about the loss of Palestine 50 years ago.

Tragically, Carter missed an important opportunity in Geneva. Having spent so much time building credibility with the Palestinians, he could have confronted them with uncomfortable truths and pushed for a true peace. Instead, he preferred to preserve his popularity in the Arab world.

Carter remains a shrewd politician and knows his constituency well. It includes the perverse essayist in the Montreal Gazette who recently reached back to Baruch Goldstein's murder of 29 Muslims in 1994 – roundly condemned by most Jews – to explain that "the Istanbul bombers" of two synagogues "have evened the score at last."

Carter's constituency also includes suburbanites who live in gated communities to protect their possessions but begrudge Israelis a security fence to protect their lives. It includes Canadian leaders who get angrier at Israel for warning about threats than they do at Hamas recruits planning to export their violence to North America. It includes Americans and Canadians who would scoff at uniting their own countries, but demand that Israelis and Palestinians ignore their respective national dreams to live in an absurd one-state entity.

Sadly, today's topsy-turvy world offers no Nobel Prize for truth-telling and few kudos to democracy's defenders. Carter the peacemaker should know what Israelis have tragically learned – that only honesty, clarity, and mutual respect can bring a true peace.

Chanukah and the memory of things past

Lucky George Santayana. The Spanish-born American philosopher and poet entered popular consciousness with his pithy statement about knowledge, the past, and the present. "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Particularly around the time of Jewish festivals and holidays, with their injunctions to remember and learn from the Jewish past, Santayana's dictum gives a modern edge to the ancient practice of recollecting and retelling.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

But memory is a tricky business. Our recollection of things past is always mediated and given shape by the present. Even when looking back on our own lives, current concerns determine, in large measure, what we recall and how we recall it. If this is true for personal memory, it is doubly so for the kind of memory Santayana was talking about – a distant past that is given meaning over time. But as events shift, so does our relationship to the past.

Take Chanukah, for example. Mindful of Santayana, we might ask: by remembering the events the festival commemorates, what unwanted repetition of the past might we avoid? Where do we see ourselves in the story of miraculous oil, Jews versus Syrian-Greeks and zealots (or Maccabees) versus hellenized Jews?

A distinguished Jewish historian once devised an intriguing parlour game: after retelling a holiday story, participants would choose characters they identified with and explain why. Not surprisingly, regarding Chanukah, traditional Judaism identifies with the Maccabees, both in their fight against overwhelming external forces and in their struggle with internal erosion.

Many contemporary interpretations link the hellenized Jews of yore with assimilated Jews of today – Jews who jettison tradition and culture, refashioning themselves as culturally neutral Canadians in order to "belong." In this light, one of the lessons of Chanukah would be to imitate the zealots – to retain Jewish names, languages, texts and traditions – unlike hellenized Jews, who turned to idolatry and gymnastics.

But the extreme and mutually exclusive positions of zealot and hellenist are not the only choices. Suppose we substitute "integrated" for the loaded term "assimilated" to describe the majority in our community. With the exception of a small number who actively resist integration, most Jews draw on a cultural mix that leaves them feeling both deeply Jewish and deeply Canadian, regardless of denominational affiliation.

Closer to home, many Jews have grown uncomfortable with zealotry. Most Canadian Jews repudiate extreme and absolute adherents to a cause, particularly those who, presuming divine sanction, fly planes into skyscrapers, detonate explosives at seders and cafés and assassinate the head of the Jewish state.

The Maccabean struggle against the Syrian-Greeks presents easier possibilities, resonating as an archetypal representation of Jewish survival against overwhelming odds. We might also see it as an example of Jewish self-determination, a model both for minority communities in the diaspora and for the State of Israel. And, just as our tradition reminds us that our prototypical experience as outsiders should make us compassionate toward outsiders in our midst, our memory of battling for self-determination might make us affirm it in principle for others as well as for ourselves, both in multicultural Canada and in Israel.

What we call "lessons of the past" solidify in particular places at particular moments. They come under dispute, perpetually revised and revisited. We sometime grow nostalgic for a simpler relationship to the past, with sureties recollected from childhood. But ultimately, we requires a Judaism for adults.

I am not advocating a diminished role for Jewish memory and the Jewish past. To the contrary. If our relationship to the Jewish past is to continue to be meaningful, we must embrace its contentiousness.

Santayana would approve. This highly complex and skeptical thinker strongly identified with his Catholic background – so much so that he lived out the last decade of his life, until his death some 50 years ago, in a convent in Rome. Yet, he observed, "Most conventional ideals, the religious ones included, are not adequate to the actual nature and capacities of men who accept them."

In a dialogic relationship with the Jewish past, we might adopt – at least provisionally – radically different ways of understanding the past, its relationship to the present and its implications for the future. We might come away turning traditional meaning on its head, or reaffirming inherited meanings, or developing more deeply nuanced understandings. In making active our relationship to the Jewish past, we give punch to Jewish continuity and open up new ethical possibilities.

MDA mission participants see fruit of their labour

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A group of 15 people from Toronto and Montreal who helped raise $111,100 for a mobile intensive care unit (MICU) for Israel recently came back from a Magen David Adom mission to Israel, where they saw the unit being used.

Sandy Galet, mother of four children and grandmother of 12, who organized the fundraising activities for the MICU, was also the organizer of the trip.

"When we saw our mobile intensive care unit at Kiryat Shmona, it was like seeing the baby that we had delivered and now living in Israel," Galet said.

"And seeing the ambulances lined up at their stations and along the streets, we realized why we were here in Israel – to be part of the life-saving process, the most important mission of all."

Galet said Dorothy Ross, one of the tour members, used her winnings from an international competition of Judaica art to purchase an ambulance in memory of her parents.

"Dorothy was especially moved to meet the driver of her ambulance who takes it home everyday," Galet said. "The driver showed the ambulance with pride and pointed out that it had already clocked up 35,000 kilometres and has been involved in several incidents."

While on the trip, the group paid a visit to the Tel Nof Air Force base, where they learned about life-saving procedures and had lunch with the pilots. They had dinner at the Knesset with members of the international Magen David Adom committee meeting. They also attended a standing-room-only concert at the Israel Philharmonic with Israeli singer Achi Noam Nini.

"For us, being in Israel and attending the sold-out concert despite the constant threats of terror, and seeing that Israelis continue to go out and have not given up on culture and the arts despite the threats, told us that nothing is going to hold them back," Galet said.

The group also visited the Blood Donor Clinic in Jerusalem.

"Everyone who visits Israel should consider donating blood," she said. "It didn't take long and it may save a life. And it creates an unbelievable bond with our Israeli family."

ISRAELI MADRICHIM: Associated Hebrew Schools Grade 5 students welcomed Israeli madrichim, sponsored by The Jewish Agency for Israel and the BJE. Students created newspapers headlining Chanukah and the War of Independence and held press conferences with the madrichim who posed as Judah the Maccabi, Yitzhak Rabin, David Ben Gurion and Antiochus. The program allowed students to draw conclusions about the parallel experiences of the Jewish people's quest for independence both 2000 years ago and in 1948.

Associated benefactor recalls a lifetime of giving

'I can't remember how many things I dedicated'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

You could call Nathan Oscar Hurwich "Mr. Generosity."

For more than half a century, Hurwich, 94, was a trailblazer in fundraising for numerous causes in Canada and Israel and received more than 100 plaques and citations.

Although he has been honoured for his exemplary work for United Jewish Appeal, as a top canvasser for the Jewish National Fund and by many other organizations, Hurwich's dedication to Jewish education, particularly to the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, is legendary.

In 1979, after more than 40 years of support for the Associated, he and his wife endowed the Nathan O. and Roey Hurwich Educational Centre on Finch Avenue, just east of Bathurst Street. Recently, after four years and a $7-million retrofit, the building was reopened as Associated's middle school.

In an interview at Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence, where he and his wife of 72 years have lived for the past four years, Hurwich recalled that when he was 8 years old, he would trudge off to cheder on Simcoe Street every weekday after school and on Sundays. It was called the Toronto Hebrew Free School at the time, and later became the Associated Hebrew Day Schools of Toronto.

"I remember that many times I used to sneak away from cheder to play baseball at the Simcoe Street playground."

Discussing his past involvement with Associated and other organizations, Hurwich said, "I can't remember how many things I dedicated, because it has been in many, many places."

Looking back, "the most important things to me are the Associated and my synagogue, Beth Tzedec," said Hurwich, who is a founding member of Beth Tzedec Congregation and has held almost every office at the shul.

"We have no children," he continued. "I became enthused with the work of the Associated, because I thought it was very important for the Jewish people to have the school, for without the Jewish schools, we have no future."

Arthur Landa, executive director of Associated, said Hurwich is one of the school's oldest alumni. He has served on its va'ad hachinuch, scholarship committee, and board of directors, as well as chair of the membership committee.

Hurwich "has devoted his life to community service in general and to the Associated in particular," Landa said.

"He has no children of his own – the Associated children are his children. To him, they owe their gratitude."

Hurwich said his philosophy is to set an example for others by contributing his own time and money before asking others to give.

Nathan Hurwich

When he was 14 years old, his father became ill, and Hurwich had to leave Harbord Collegiate to help support his family. He went to work for Tip Top Tailors and completed high school at night.

Later, with very little capital, he opened a small automotive jobbing business. He sold the firm and founded Mobile Automotive Products, a manufacturers' distributor that he eventually sold to Acklands Ltd.

In addition to his work with Associated and Beth Tzedec, Hurwich was also co-chair, with Judge Sydney Harris, of the Soviet Jewry Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Among his many awards, he has received an honorary doctorate from Bar-Ilan University for his volunteerism, and Bar-Ilan named an academic chair in community relations in his honour.

Muslim student criticized for supporting Israel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For Sarah Nasser, being an identifiable Muslim who openly supports the existence of the State of Israel has meant getting used to being verbally assaulted.

Sarah Nasser

Outside the conference held by Al-Awda, the Palestinian Right to Return Coalition, at the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education last month, a group of Arab students went so far as to tell her that she doesn't have a right to exist, she recalled.

"I spoke to the police after that incident," the third-year University of Toronto student said.

Nasser, 20, was born in Tanzania and moved to Canada with her parents as a young child. In an interview with The CJN, she remembered that Israel and the Jews were always considered to be "at an inferior level" by members of the Islamic community here.

"In my early teens, I started to read history books and began to challenge what was being said in the mosques," she said.

Then, in 1997, while on her way to Mecca for an off-season pilgrimage with her family, Nasser spent a day in Jerusalem.

While travelling around the West Bank and Jerusalem, she said it soon became clear that almost everything she had been taught about Israel was not true.

"I saw that Palestinians had cars and homes and [I realized] that parts of Canada were worse than even the most downtrodden parts of the West Bank," she said.

"It confirmed my views that members of the Muslim community were misrepresenting what was going on."

Even though she rarely signs petitions, Nasser recently added her name to the petition being sent to the United Nations condemning suicide bombing as a crime against humanity.

Nasser, who is an executive for the University of Toronto Progressive Conservatives and a member of the Delta Delta Delta Sorority, said she knows some individuals don't agree with her point of view.

"I'm learning to expect the verbal abuse, but I try not to let it silence me, because then, they've won," she said.

Joseph Berman 'saw tselem elokim in everyone'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Toronto businessman and philanthropist Joseph Berman died recently after a long illness. He was 81.

Berman was born in Elmira, Ont., to a family that included six brothers and sisters, and he grew up in the Kensington Market area of Toronto. He had his bar mitzvah at the Kiever Shul, and later became one of the major donors to its restoration.

Together with Jack Kamin and Eph Diamond, he founded Cadillac Development Corp, which later became Cadillac-Fairview after a merger. The company was responsible for many high rise apartment and commercial projects, including the Toronto Eaton Centre and Vancouver's Pacific Centre.

But he "didn't just build homes, he built neshamas [souls]," said his daughter Shellie Grafstein.

His interest in people, she said, cut across all religious, ethnic and class lines. "He saw the tselem elokim [[the likeness of God] in everyone."

When he and his wife, Helen, finished building their new home, she said, their first party was for all the tradespeople who had been involved, from the person who made the drapes to the person who swept the floor.

This quality came out in his wide-ranging philanthropic activities. He contributed generously to educational causes, including the Board of Jewish Education, Yesodei Hatorah, Bais Yaakov and the special education facilities of the Reena Foundation (including its group homes), She'arim Hebrew Day School and Zareinu Educational Centre. He also founded a yeshiva for the deaf and was involved with the Technion and Boys Town Jerusalem in Israel.

In addition, he supported the Jewish Russian community, Ohr Somayach and Aish HaTorah, giving seed money to its Discovery, Common Ground and Common Denominator programs.

He contributed to a research project on Sudden Infant Death Syndrome at the Hospital for Sick Children, and donated a wing at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Berman chaired the United Jewish Appeal campaign, contributing generously himself. As well, he helped support Judy Feld Carr's rescue of Syrian Jews, and contributed a plane to Operation Solomon, the project to bring Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

"He didn't just give financially," Grafstein said. "He gave his time, and his guidance."

He didn't allow his business or philanthropic work to detract from his family, she said.

"He was a great dad – he taught us how to ride bikes and to drive, and helped us with our homework. When he was with us, he was totally with us."

His relationship with his wife, Helen, remained close and romantic throughout the years, Grafstein said. "He left her a note or a poem every single morning."

Berman is survived by wife Helen, children Shellie Grafstein, Evie Garnet, David Berman and Allan Berman. He was predeceased by son Laurie. He is also survived by sisters Brindy Schecter, Ruth Krawsowsky, Marilyn Serota and brother Mo Berman, as well as by 64 grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Mock wedding celebrates Diaspora, Israel ties

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The bride and groom stood under the chupah, surrounded by well-wishers. When the groom broke the glass of wine, the music started up and everyone began dancing a horah.

But this was not a Jewish wedding. In fact, it wasn't a wedding at all. It was a mock ceremony symbolizing the sacred connection between Diaspora Jews and Israel.

The mock ceremony began the evening billed as the Anglo Saxon Golden Exile Diaspora Zionist Party held recently at the downtown Cecil Street Community Centre, formerly the Anshei Ostrovtzer Synagogue. Some 110 people came for the festivities that marked 56 years since Nov. 29, 1947, the date the UN voted to partition British Mandate Palestine into Jewish and Arab states.

The party was organized by the Zionist Leadership Initiative, a group that view themselves as a new generation of Diaspora Zionists, says Benjamin Rubin, an organizer of the party and one of the organizers of the Zionist Leadership Initiative.

"We're a different generation from our parents," Rubin said. "Israel didn't exist when they were growing up. Our parents mostly knew Hebrew from prayer books. They didn't know how to speak it.

"We are much more culturally, socially and experientially connected to Israel. We speak Hebrew. Popular Israeli music is part of our cultural repertoire. Many of us have lived in Israel or spent a significant amount of time there. We feel when we go to Israel that we're insiders."

Rubin said the Zionist Leadership Initiative grew out of a conference organized by the World Zionist Organization in Duck Key, Florida in 2000. The conference drew 70 participants from across North America between the ages of 25 and 50. According to Rubin, a core group within the 20 representatives from Toronto "were inspired to carry on."

As a result of their efforts, the Toronto group launched the New House of Israel Web site, www.newhouseofisrael.com.

"This is an online global think-tank that sparks creative thought about the meaning of the collectivity of Israel, the destiny of the land of Israel and the interpretation of the learning of Israel," said Rubin, noting that the site was formally launched at the World Zionist Congress held in Jerusalem in 2002.

Since then, the Zionist Leadership Initiative has held several events, including A Zionist Debate: Heavyweight Boxing for the Jewish Mind and the Lag Ba Omer 2002 Zionist Vision Speech Contest. The three winners attended the 2002 World Zionist Congress in Jerusalem.

In addition to innovative programming, Rubin said the Zionist Leadership Initiative is pioneering new methods of political organizing and community building through e-mail and Web sites "for a new digitally connected generation."

The group, he said, has been involved in efforts to democratize the Canadian Zionist Federation, calling for elections, which have not been held for a generation.

Upcoming events include a Tu b'Shvat program Feb. 7, 2004, at the Moon Bean Cafe on St. Andrew Street in Kensington Market, and the True North Zionist Conference Festival, a family camp to be held May 28-30, 2004 at Camp George in Muskoka. McGill history professor Gil Troy will be a keynote speaker.

For more information about these events or the Zionist Leadership Initiative, visit wwwzionistparty.com or call 416-929-2919.

Group bat mitzvah celebrated

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — Preparation for their group bat mitzvah on Dec. 13 united a group of women with diverse backgrounds in their desire for personal accomplishment, says Denise Newman, president of B'nai Israel Synagogue.

The women committed themselves to diligent study because they wanted to learn and grow as individuals, Newman said in a telephone interview.

When Newman initiated the project in 2002, the enthusiasm was overwhelming. "There was an incredible response."

Newman said she was thrilled when 22 women, ranging in age from 28 to 86, made the commitment to the weekly study sessions, which ultimately ended up being bi-weekly classes.

The majority of the women were in their 60s and they ran traditional Jewish homes, yet they had little or no Hebrew education. Many had to learn to read Hebrew as total beginners, Newman said.

"Their dedication was amazing. These women have always been involved in the Jewish community, but now they have expanded their understanding and appreciation of Jewish life."

Newman did have a Hebrew education as a youth, but she did not have a bat mitzvah.

"It wasn't a given then. As a participant in this b'nai mitzvah program, I am fortunate to have another opportunity to accomplish this."

Rabbi Eliyahu Courante led the classes, with the help of synagogue volunteers. In addition to developing Hebrew-reading skills, studying prayers and the Haftorah, the women learned Torah reading.

The b'nai mitzvah service was the first opportunity for women at B'nai Israel to have aliyot on their own. In the past, a woman participating in a bat mitzvah service could only have a joint aliyah with a man.

Over the past year and half, as the women developed their knowledge of the service, they began attending Shabbat services more frequently, Newman said.

"With knowledge comes understanding, and with understanding there is less confusion. Now the women get more pleasure out of the service because they know what is going on. If they lose their place during a prayer, they can find it again and catch up. Instead of just sitting there, they are singing and participating. I think it brings them back to the synagogue."

Newman noted that last year was the 100th anniversary of the Jewish community in St. Catharines.

"This reinforces the next 100 years. It reinforces that we're here to stay."

In a small Jewish community, it is important to do as much as possible to bring people back to their roots, while at the same time moving forward, she said.

"It's not easy to do. But we must."

The women's commitment to study for their bat mitzvah has set an example for our children and our children's children, she said.

As well, after devoting so many months to preparing, the women have developed a greater appreciation of the work required by their children and grandchildren in preparation for a bar or bat mitzvah, she noted.

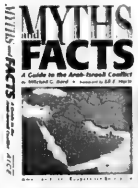
"They have so much more to learn than we did. It has created an admiration for our kids."

Calumny of Nazi comparison

MYTH:

Israel is pursuing a policy of genocide toward the Palestinians that is comparable to the Nazis' treatment of the Jews.

FACT:



This is perhaps the most odious claim made by Israel's detractors. The Nazis' objective was the systematic extermination of every Jew in Europe. Israel, on the other hand, is seeking peace with its Palestinian neighbours. More than one million Arabs live as free and equal citizens in Israel. Of the Palestinians in the territories, 98 per cent live under the civil administration of the Palestinian Authority (PA). While Israel sometimes employs harsh measures against Palestinians in the territories to protect Israeli citizens – Jews and non-Jews – from the incessant campaign of terror waged by the PA and Islamic radicals, there is no plan to persecute, exterminate or expel the Palestinian people.

The absurdity of the charge is also clear from the demography of the disputed territories. While detractors make outrageous claims about Israel committing genocide or ethnic cleansing, the Palestinian population has continued to explode. In Gaza, for example, the population increased from 731,000 in July 1994 to 1,225,911 in July 2002, an increase of 68 per cent. The growth rate was 3.95 per cent, one of the highest in the world. According to the UN, the total Palestinian population in all the disputed territories (Gaza, the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem) was 1,006,000 in 1950, 1,094,000 in 1970 and exploded to 2,152,000 in 1990.

Since the intifadah, the Palestinian population has continued to grow exponentially, increasing more than 20 per cent just from 1995 to 2,000, when it reached 3,183,000. This increase has been noted to be the result of improvements in income and health services made by Israel.

Jewish Life

Beyond the latkes

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic
Moments

For most Jews living in today's world, Chanukah is a holiday of lighting candles, spinning dreidels and frying latkes. We speak of the great victory of the Hasmoneans and the rededication of the Temple, and we light our candles. We listen to our children sing of their clay dreidels, that simple song where the child must wait until the dreidel is "dry and ready" so it can be taken out to play.

It's no wonder that for the greater part of Jewish history, Chanukah lay quietly as an almost forgotten, minor holiday. Jewish law necessitated that we light candles and so we did. But little attention was paid to Chanukah for centuries. Now suddenly, Chanukah has moved to the forefront of our Jewish consciousness and we celebrate it both privately and communally. What brought about this shift?

The challenge of how to celebrate Chanukah is probably due in no small degree to the fact that we have no anchoring text for the festival. There is no text about it in the Hebrew Bible and no mention of it at all anywhere in the Tanach. Every other Jewish holiday has a text we can study and explore to enrich our understanding.

Chanukah was adrift in a world of ideas.

In our desire to hold on to something concrete, we grabbed hold of the only elements we could find: the candles, the dreidels and the latkes. Sadly, these became the central components of the holiday.

The texts that record the events of Chanukah, the books of the Maccabees, although written by Jewish authors for Jewish readers, were never included in our canon of holy texts. Once these books are included in the Catholic Bibles, they are deliberately ignored by Jewish readers and Chanukah moves farther into the world of the abstract – farther away from any anchoring text.

The problem compounded when Jewish communities throughout history could not relate to the images of the Jewish warriors found within the Chanukah narrative. An extraordinary family that unites the Jewish people into an army and fights off an empire was not a model that spoke to Jewish people living in exile under foreign rule. And then the early Zionists emerged in the modern Jewish world and everything started to change.

To those Zionists who argued for the possibility of a Jewish homeland in Israel, the warriors of Chanukah were not only real – they were inspiring. As Zionism became a reality and the state of Israel became more than a dream, Chanukah grew in significance year after year.

And, as Israel built its army and succeeded in wars where incredible odds were stacked against it, Chanukah became a reality.

In today's world, Jewish communities celebrate Chanukah on a scale unseen before in Jewish history. We are cautiously looking into the books of the Maccabees only to find a description of men engaged in physical battle on the front lines and women engaged in a cultural and religious battle in the cities. We are inspired and uplifted by learning of Jews who stood up to assimilation, reaffirmed their identities and then confronted their enemy. We glow with pride as we sing of their victory.

This year, we will hear our children sing again of their clay dreidels. Let's make sure we also teach them the song Mi Yimaleil – particularly the part that says, "For in every generation a hero will arise who can redeem the nation."

Chanukah humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Chanukah humour? Is this some kind of joke?

Actually, yes. Chanukah may certainly be an enjoyable holiday, but we don't usually associate it with humour. But if you look hard enough, you can find a lot that's funny about the Festival of Lights. Especially if you know where to look on the World Wide Web.

Stop me if you've heard this one: "A woman went to the post office to buy stamps for her Chanukah cards. 'What denomination?' asked the clerk. 'Oh, good heavens! Have we come to this?' replied the woman. 'Well, give me 50 Conservative, 2 Orthodox, 37 Reform and 11 Reconstructionist'" [www.haruth.com/Jhumor55.html#Stamps].

I nearly choked on my chocolate dreidel when I came across "Latke vs. Hamantasch: A Materialist-Feminist Analysis." Penned by Robin Leidner of University of Pennsylvania's sociology department, she tries to settle once and for all, the age-old question: which food is more liberating for women – latkes or hamantaschen. Let's just say that things don't come out to well for our favourite pancake.

"After peeling, grating, frying batch after batch in spitting oil, the cook is exhausted and sweaty, her hair hangs in greasy clumps, her knuckles are scraped raw, her arms sting from the continual splatters of oil. When at last a heaping plate of latkes is ready, she brings it to the table, where every one is snatched up immediately. Stoically, she heads back to the stove to begin frying the next batch."

"[F]or women," Leidner says, "it is clear that hamantaschen offer far more scope for self-realization, egalitarian relations, and social progress than do latkes" [www3.bc.sympatico.ca/myssiwyg/latkes.html].

Are you a bit hazy about what the Maccabees really did 2,000 years ago? Then check out The Absolutely True Story of Chanukah by the late Sam Orbaum, Jerusalem Post columnist. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?I5E7241C6] Once you know the history, you shouldn't find the Unorthodox Chanukah Quiz too daunting [www. jr.co.il/humor/chanuka.htm]. A sample question:

In order to purify the Holy Temple, the Jews had to…

a. Get a good cleaning person who would do floors

b. Get a good cleaning person who would do walls and windows, too (now that's a miracle!)

c. Get some lamp oil.

Finding funny Top Ten Lists on the Internet can be a hit-and-miss venture. But I must admit I cracked a smile when I saw the reasons why Chanukah is unlike that other holiday that falls this time of year [www.humormatters.com/holidays/Hanukkah/]:

- Latkes are cheaper to mail than fruitcakes.
- No barking dog version of I Have a Little Dreidel.
- There's no latke-nog.

It just wouldn't be Chanukah without Adam Sandler's modern classic The Chanukah Song, in which he reminds the world about prominent Jews in movies, music and sports. In the process, he finds some interesting rhymes for the word Chanukah [www.chanuka.com/songs.shtml]:

"Put on that yarmulke/ It's time for Chanukah/ Two-time Oscar winner/ Dustin Hoffmanica/ Celebrates Chanukah…"

You can find all three versions of Sandler's song online, along with a video excerpt from Saturday Night Live [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Y3EA211C6], in which he appears with the Drei-Dels, the beaming kids' choir from the Sid Jacobson JCC on Long Island [www.sjjcc.org/newstories/jccsnl.htm]. But remember that Sandler pushes boundaries and his lyrics aren't always as gentle as I Have a Little Dreidel.

Another Chanukah song online is a take on Lou Bega's hit Mambo No. 5 ("A little bit of Monica in my life/ A little bit of Erica in my life…") It's by "Louis Bagel" and it's called Matzah No. 5 [www.geocities.com/Hollywood/Bungalow/4550/matzah51.wav]:

"I really love that Chanukah – it lasts eight nights./ A little bit of Passover is all right./ A really big bar mitzvah is what I had./ I'm moving to Miami just like my dad./ Rosh Hashanah is the Jewish New Year./ I really like a bagel with some shmeer./ My mother's name is Esther, my dad is Stan./ I like to go and see Barbra Streisand!"

Clinton urges resumption of Mideast peace talks

By MATT BELLAN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Former U.S. president Bill Clinton called on Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to resume peace talks in a Dec. 9 talk before a crowd of about 1,600 people at Winnipeg's Centennial Concert Hall.

Clinton, making his first visit to Winnipeg, quoted a statement by the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

"Rabin was right when he said: 'I will negotiate as if there were no terror, and I'll fight terror as if there were no negotiations,'" Clinton said.

"That's the way it ought to be done. Delaying everything to death, they'll never resolve it."

Clinton commented on the Middle East peace process during a question-and-answer session after an hour-long speech about "global interdependence."

In that address, part of a celebrity speakers series organized by promoters Marvin Meltzer and Jerry Shore, Clinton called for more international co-operation to solve world problems ranging from Iraq to the AIDS epidemic in the developing world.

Clinton said developed countries such as Canada and the United States can't afford to ignore those problems. He argued that letting Third World and Mideast crises fester will breed more angry people in poorer countries who are more likely to turn to terrorism within and beyond their borders.

"We are interdependent in ways that go beyond economics," he said. "The word 'interdependent' means 'we cannot escape each other.'"

Responding at length to a question about how he thought the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would be resolved, Clinton defended the Oslo peace process that he presided over as president.

"We stumbled along that path with fits and starts for seven years, and it went pretty well," he said, as a large screen behind him projected his image to the crowd. "And finally, I got [former Israeli prime minister Ehud] Barak to accept an offer in 2000 that [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat turned down – one of the most colossal historical errors in my lifetime."

Clinton said Arafat later acknowledged the peace offer was a good one.

"A year later, after I was gone and an Israeli government wouldn't give it to him, and an Israeli public didn't support Arafat, he said: 'I'm in favour of the Clinton peace plan.'

"Now we have 2,300 dead Palestinians, average age 18, and almost 900 dead Israelis, average age 24, because we are simply denying their interdependence," Clinton added, referring to the intifadah Arafat started after turning down the Camp David peace offer.

Clinton also gave a backhanded compliment to the Israeli and Palestinian moderates who negotiated the Geneva Accord.

"They took my last, best offer and just filled in the blanks," he said of the Geneva document, which offers a detailed plan to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Clinton said the accord, which spells out solutions to such difficult issues as dividing Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees, shows that "Palestinians and Israelis can actually make the decisions on these kinds of issues."

Eventually, he said, "like it or not, they're going to have to share the future. They're going to have to share that small piece of land and Jerusalem. They're going to have to share security responsibilities.

"They're going to have to share economic benefits, and the rest of us are going to have to help them bear the costs of relocating and compensating the refugees."

The Palestinians, he said, will have to give up the idea of an "unlimited right of return," and return to a Palestinian state in exchange for "ample compensation for the refugees."

In turn, Israel will have to stop "expanding settlements" in the occupied territories, give up "most of the West Bank," and compensate settlers forced to leave, he said.

Clinton acknowledged that Israel "can survive" without a peace deal, "because we won't let them die."

But he predicted that Israelis' "lives will be unhappy and insecure and more twisted if they just go on and leave things be."

Choirs delight Ottawa audience

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When Cantor Benjamin Maissner, the musical director of Lachan, the Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, met David Malecki, musical director of Ottawa's Musica Ebraica, at last year's North American Jewish Choral Festival in New York, they began planning a joint concert.

The results thrilled a capacity crowd early this month at Agudath Israel Synagogue.

Although each choir sang separately, they came together for a few selections and blended seamlessly, making it difficult to believe they had rehearsed together for only a short time before the performance.

Lachan, now in its 10th season, has performed in concert around the world, including at the Sounds of Healing in Nuremberg, Germany, where it represented Canada at a choral gathering that featured Jewish choral ensembles, primarily from the United States and Israel.

Both Lachan and Musica Ebraica, which was founded in 2001, perform classical and popular Jewish choral music from around the world. At the concert, they performed a diverse program that included two selections by Salamone Rossi, the first major Jewish composer, who lived in Renaissance Italy, and a selection by Sara Shoham, a contemporary Israeli composer. Ocho Kandelikas, a lively Chanukah song in Ladino, was written by Flory Jagoda about the Chanukahs she remembered as a child growing up in Sarajevo. The guitar accompanist for that number, Daria Ribar, is also from Sarajevo.

Barbara Kagedan, who founded Musica Ebraica in 2001 with director David Malecki, said, "We had recently discovered that there is a whole world of incredibly beautiful and unusual Jewish choral music, and we wanted both to sing it and to bring it to Ottawa so that others could discover this music, too.

"The music we do comes from all the Jewish traditions: Sephardi, Ashkenazi, Italian, Israeli, North American. Part of what we enjoy so much is the window that music can open on a part of Jewish history and culture."

Musica Ebraica's members come from a wide variety of backgrounds, both Jewish and non-Jewish. Malecki is Polish Catholic.

"It has been extraordinary – especially in the sometimes tense political atmosphere of the last two years – to have this little group where people of different backgrounds come together to sing Jewish choral music and explore Judaism together," Kagedan said. "For me, personally, it has been like a little haven in this very difficult world."

The choirs also performed at the Dec. 4 opening of the exhibit "Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls" at the Canadian Museum of Civilization.

Outgoing senator raps Canadian, Israeli policies

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Retiring Liberal senator Leo Kolber criticized the Canadian government for having "strayed" in recent years from its support of Israel, and especially since the Conservative government of Brian Mulroney.

Leo Kolber

"Canada's policy on the Middle East in the last few years has wandered off the moral centre of the political spectrum," Kolber said at a B'nai Brith Canada dinner in his honour.

Kolber, a former chief fundraiser for the Liberal party who was appointed to the Senate by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau in 1983, praised former Tory prime minister Brian Mulroney for his "unstinting support of Israel… I have to say that Israel never had a better friend in Canada than when he was prime minister."

Kolber said he believes that under incoming prime minister Paul Martin, Canada will support a Palestinian state, but that its Middle East policy will be "rooted in its historic support of Israel." He was speaking a week before Martin took office.

Kolber was especially harsh on Canada's record at the United Nations.

"In our typically Canadian desire to be all things to all people, we have fallen silent at the UN. We have abstained far too often on issues that have seen Israel stigmatized in the very global forum where it was born."

He accused the foreign affairs department of "Arabist leanings and proclivities," adding that this did not do any good for Maher Arar, the Muslim Canadian who alleges that he was tortured in a Syrian prison.

He also regretted Canada's "muted" response to former Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad's tirade against Jews in October.

Kolber, however, said he disagreed with many of the Israeli government's policies and spoke of this being "a time of anguish for Israelis and Palestinians alike," deploring "the circle of violence."

He said "neither Palestinian terror, nor Israeli reprisal, is working. Neither will ever achieve its obective.

"The Palestinian terrorists will never succeed in their goal of driving the Israelis into the sea. The Israeli government will never succeed in pacifying a civilian population with tanks, or by building a wall around Israel," he said.

Kolber stressed that those who criticize Israeli policies should not automatically be called anti-Semitic and may, in fact, abhor anti-Semitism.

"I welcome criticism of Israel and, in fact, I'm a critic myself. I think their policy on the settlements leaves a lot to be desired and I think that their reprisals are sometimes overdone," he said.

Kolber sees some promise in the Geneva Accord, the unofficial peace plan proposed by his "old buddy" former Israeli justice minister Yossi Beilin and former Palestinian information minister Yasser Abed Rabbo.

"It needs improvement, but it is a beginning, a step away from war, a step towards peace."

Kolber said the terror must stop before any peace talks are possible, and then Israel must be prepared to concede land, including settlements, for peace.

Kolber said poor living conditions in many Palestinian towns have "led to the death of hope, the birth of despair, and the absence of dignity that leads young Palestinians to embrace terror and become suicide bombers."

At the same time, he blamed the oil-rich Arab states for failing to relieve the squalor. "It is their moral obligation, as peoples of means, to look after their own, just as Jews always have," he said.

Kolber said he was speaking as someone who has travelled to Israel 55 times since the 1950s, who counts senior Israeli figures among his close friends, and whose son, daughter-in-law and three grandchildren live there.

"I want my grandchildren to have the opportunity to grow up in the emotional security of a land at peace with itself and its neighbours. I want them to grow up in a world without anti-Semitism."

Kolber, who received B'nai Brith's Award of Merit, was speaking to close to 600 guests at the dinner, which was co-chaired by McGill University principal emeritus Bernard Shapiro and Robert Panet-Raymond, a senior vice-president of CIBC.

Kolber was right-hand man to the Bronfman family for many years, heading its family trust Cemp Investments and Cadillac-Fairview, its real estate company.

Kolber also expressed deep concern for the rise of anti-Semitism in the world. "We Jews have seldom needed the support of the gentile world in the fight against anti-Semitism more than we do now."

He said that anti-Semitism is linked to the violence between in the Middle East. "We are identifiable as Jews, identified with Israel. In some sense, even a subliminal sense, we are blamed every time [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon sends in the tanks."

B'nai Brith international affairs chair Amos Sochaczevski took a harder line.

"Israel is in the frontlines of the battle against the terrorists and their supporters. Whether they are terrorists who drape themselves in explosives, or terrorists in business suits at the UN, they are the enemies of all Western civilization," Sochaczevski said.

"Israel, even when confronted by horrific terror attacks, has preserved all the basic values of democracy and, indeed, serves as a role model for the entire world."

He said B'nai Brith advocates not only for Israel's "right to exist, but Israel's right to defend itself against the onslaught of terror."

Canada's voting "against Israel in the UN over 90 per cent of the time is totally unacceptable," he said. "The silence of some is deafening."

Don't dismiss the Geneva dissenters

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

It would be an understatement to say that the Geneva Accord, officially released earlier this month, received a great deal of media attention – most of it positive.

Many editorials lauded the unofficial peace plan, as this selection of headlines shows: "A tantalizing preview of a Mideast accord" (Globe and Mail, Dec. 2); "A fine, unofficial Mideast peace deal" (New York Times, Dec. 2); "Blessed are the peacemakers" (The Economist, Dec. 6).

Even the National Post ran an editorial titled "The deal they love to hate: But despite it all, there may be some good in the Geneva Accord" (Dec. 6). The Post wrote: "As we see it, the Geneva Accord is at worst harmless. At best, it might even provide helpful ideas that the 'real' Israeli and Palestinian leaders may want to consider."

The Post concluded that "though many of the details of the accord may prove pie-in-the-sky, the basic outline hits the right notes." The Globe editorial reached the same conclusion: "[E]very sensible Israeli and every realistic Palestinian knows that a deal much like the Geneva Accord will have to be struck in the end." In short, a two-state solution similar to that proposed in the summer-fall of 2000 and at Taba in January 2001 – and rejected by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Many newspaper columns on the accord were also positive. In the National Post, Dec. 4, "New accords may prove historic" by Neill Lochery was matched by the Dec. 5 Globe and Mail column by Shira Herzog, titled "Geneva: the road to peace." The Globe followed up on Dec. 9 with Rabbi Dow Marmur's fully supportive piece, "Hope is our only hope." (Only Amir Tahiri's "Wise men' of Geneva strike a blow to peace", National Post, Dec. 9, dissented from the virtual consensus.)

Rabbi Marmur railed against Jewish critics of Geneva for preferring to preserve the status quo. "This raises the suspicion that their real aim is to sit out the crisis until the Palestinians get exhausted and accept the harsh terms that are in store for them."

However, those who raise valid concerns about the plan must not be dismissed as hawkish rejectionists.

For example, Yossi Klein Halevi and Michael Oren are among the most astute Israeli analysts, each committed to a two-state solution. But in their Dec.15 New Republic article, "Jerusalem Dispatch: Fantasy," they write that the Palestinians must fulfill the "road map" requirement to dismantle the terrorist organizations, and reform the PA leadership, as demanded in U.S. President George W. Bush's June 24, 2002, speech. Otherwise, a Geneva-like vision may, in fact, prove inimical to Israel remaining a state, Jewish or otherwise.

The problem, write Klein Halevi and Oren, is that under Geneva, "the Palestinians get their state first and only later have to prove good faith."

Jim Lederman, the Israeli correspondent for the consulting firm Oxford Analytica, supports the general vision of Geneva. But like Klein Halevi and Oren, he worries about the details. In conversation, Lederman said: "A secular world is asking a secular Israel to come to an agreement with a secular Palestinian government that is unwilling to confront extremist Muslim organizations. That amounts to asking Israel to take a pure risk, not even a calculated risk, and in place of a calculated risk, you may well end up with incalculable damage."

Moreover, well-known members of the Israeli left, such as Yossi Alpher, have raised similar concerns, particularly over Geneva's ambiguity on the "right of return" issue.

Rabbi Marmur may be right that the Geneva Accord has "made it possible again to think peace." But the objections raised by Klein Halevi, Oren, Lederman and others must not be dismissed out of hand.

Dead Sea Scrolls bring Qumran to the capital

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In the week leading up to the Dec. 4 opening of an exhibit on the the Dead Sea Scrolls at the Canadian Museum of Civilization, Ottawans were immersed in lectures, films and programs about the famous artifacts.

Adolfo Roitman, curator of the Shrine of the Book, which houses the Dead Sea Scroll collection at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, spoke to groups of teachers, Christian clergy and members of the public at a variety of venues.

He also spoke at Friday evening services at Temple Israel and at Sunday morning services at a local church. During a Saturday evening talk at Temple Israel sponsored by the Ottawa International Writer's Festival, the Ottawa Citizen and the Embassy of Israel, he spoke about "Judaism as a Book-Centred Civilization: The Case of the Qumran Library."

As well, Esther Chazon, director of Hebrew University's Orion Center for the Study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Associated Literature, spoke at the National Library of Canada on "The Power of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Mystery of the Qumran Community" in a program co-sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Council of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection.

Hundreds also attended the exhibit's opening at the Canadian Museum of Civilization, among them many clergy, diplomats and academics.

The exhibition, titled "Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls," arrived in Ottawa after a version of it appeared in Montreal over the summer. It displays sections from three of the scrolls discovered in a desert cave by a young Bedouin shepherd in 1947: the Isaiah B Scroll, the Community Rule Scroll and the War Scroll. Two of the fragments have never been outside Israel before, and the third has not left since being purchased from an American collector some 50 years ago.

"[These artifacts] illuminate an era of profound importance for human history and for two of the world's great religions, Judaism and Christianity," said Victor Rabinovitch, the museum's president and CEO.

The early relationship between these two religious communities can also be seen in the artifacts on display, including Christian amulets, lamps decorated with Christian symbols and the only archeological evidence of the crucifixion, the Ossuary of Yehohanan, son of Hagkol.

One item, a miniature ivory pomegranate thought to be the tip of a priestly sceptre in the eighth century BCE, is the only known object believed to be from the First Temple.Another, a 2,700-year-old amulet once worn by a Jewish priest, includes portions of the familiar blessing that begins with the words "The Lord bless thee and keep thee" – a prayer still recited in synagogues and churches around the world.

Also among the 100-plus artifacts are everyday objects such as oil lamps, cooking bowls and a women's cosmetic palette.

The exhibition will return to Israel after it closes April 12. In conjunction with the exhibition, there will be a series of lectures by leading specialists, free of charge, on Thursday evenings. Guided tours of the exhibition are also available.

Cotler, Austin, Saada join PM Martin's cabinet

Married with four children, Saada came to Montreal as a university student in 1969 and studied linguistics. He has been a teacher, school administrator, translator and government consultant. He was president of the federal Liberals' Quebec wing from 1991 to 1993 and its Quebec director-general before that.

He publicly endorsed Martin's leadership bid last March.

Saada, who has lived on the South Shore for 34 years, has not been active in the Montreal Jewish community, but has been involved in the small South Shore Jewish Community, which was formed eight years ago.

He was one of 13 Liberal parliamentarians who asked the CRTC to deny a broadcast license to Al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based satellite news channel, because of its anti-Israeli content. He was also part of a Canada-Israel Committee-sponsored parliamentary mission to Israel in 2002.

Cotler, 63, is a McGill University law professor with an international reputation as a human rights advocate and Jewish leader. He was first elected in a 1999 by-election with 92 per cent of the vote in Mount Royal, which has the largest proportion of Jews of any riding in the country.

Cotler, who appeared to be a reluctant politician almost from the outset, has been quoted as saying he would not seek re-election after his current term. He clashed early on with former prime minister Jean Chrétien over Canada's Middle East policies and publicly broke with his government when Canada abstained from a United Nations resolution condemning Israel in the early days of the intifadah.

Cotler's relationship with Martin, however, has always been friendly. During the 2000 election, Martin held a press conference at Cotler's campaign office, expressing appreciation that someone of Cotler's stature had chosen to serve the country.

In the last Parliament, Cotler was chair of the subcommittee on human rights and international development of the standing committee on foreign affairs, and a member of the justice committee. Since 2000, he had been special advisor to the foreign affairs minister on the International Criminal Court, of which he has been a leading proponent.

He also shepherded the War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity Act through Parliament.

He was also Canadian chair of the Parliamentarians for Global Action, an international organization, and co-chair of the Parliamentary Human Rights Group, the first ever all-party joint House-Senate human rights caucus.

One of the thorniest issues Cotler will deal with in the justice ministry, should he continue to hold the portfolio after the expected spring election, is same-sex marriages. The Supreme Court is expected to issue a reference on the issue next year. Cotler has told The CJN he is in favour of civil marriage for homosexuals, but believes the Supreme Court's opinion should guide legislation.

A senator since 1975, Austin, 71, most recently served as a member of the Senate committees on foreign affairs, and internal economy, budgets and administration. A Harvard law graduate, Austin was deputy energy minister in the 1970s and later principal secretary to former prime minister Pierre Trudeau.

He served in Trudeau's cabinet in the early 1980s in several portfolios, and organized three Team Canada economic missions to China in the 1990s for Chrétien.

Jewish leaders welcome statement by Church leaders on anti-Semitism

They urged all Canadians to "exercise the greatest diligence on behalf of our Jewish friends and neighbours," and come to their defence when Jews and Jewish holy places are attacked.

Anti-Semitism, the letter said, "has taken many forms, including violence against Jewish persons simply because of their ethnic or religious background, and the desecration of holy places and cemeteries."

The statement was praised by Jewish leaders.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, Canadian Jewish Congress's chair of religious and interreligious affairs, called it "warm, clear, and [a] forceful declaration."

He said it is all the more remarkable because it was not written at the request of the Jewish community.

"It was spontaneous and from the heart," Rabbi Bulka told The CJN. "It shows a genuine concern and affection."

Canadian Jews should applaud the statement and reciprocate by condemning attacks on Christians around the world, said the University of Toronto's Prof. David Novak, an expert in Jewish-Christian relations.

"Both Judaism and Christianity are under attack," Novak told The CJN. "Christians now know what it feels like to be a Jew."

He said the church statement is noteworthy because it is groundbreaking in scope and reflects "radically" different Christian attitudes toward Jews.

"There's virtually no anti-Semitism coming from the churches anymore. Anti-Semitism today comes from Islamic and leftist circles.

"When push comes to shove, Christians are the best friends Jews have. So it's in our interest to accept [the statement]."

CJC president Keith Landy also lauded the development.

"Such an effort is an integral part of defending the universal values of human dignity, democracy, pluralism, fundamental freedoms and individual liberty by all those who cherish and share them," he said.

The statement invited all Christians "to become acquainted with our Jewish brothers and sisters and with their places of worship in communities from coast to coast to coast, celebrating all that we share with our Jewish friends and neighbours, and respecting our differences."

The church leaders committed themselves "to demonstrating not only through words but through united action, our determination to confront anti-Semitism on every front.

"This we pledge in the unwavering conviction of the eternal love of Almighty God for all peoples and nations, in the unwavering conviction that we are, Jews and Christians alike, brothers and sisters, children of one God, heirs in faith of Abraham and Sarah."

Meantime, the search for peace in the Middle East will form the backdrop of the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, which runs from Jan. 18 to Jan. 25.

HAMILTON — Former Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day, says the Liberal government should stand up for democracy and support Israel, a democracy in a sea of dictatorship.

Supporting democracy should be a principal part of foreign policy, said Day, foreign affairs critic for the official Opposition.

He spoke recently at Adas Israel Synagogue, at a lecture sponsored by Hadar The Morris Lax Centre, in co-operation with B'nai B'rith Canada, Betar Tagar, Zionist @Mac; and Young Zionist Partnership.

He said that the route towards world peace is paved through the spreading of democracy because historically, democracies have rarely been at war.

As a true friend of Israel, he said, Canada must boldly articulate its support while strongly condemning Palestinian terrorists.

It is time that the Canadian government recognizes the right of Israel to exist without threat as a sovereign state, he said.

Day said the Canadian government has taken some disturbing policy positions, noting that Canada often abstains or votes against Israel at the United Nations.

"Canada continues to permit front groups to undertake fundraising for anti-Israel groups like Hamas, and it seems reluctant to ban terrorist groups like Hezbollah.

"Canada must not tolerate terrorism worldwide and it must not allow terrorist sympathizers within its borders," he said.

The cycle of violence in the Middle East must be broken, Day said.

"But it is not morally equivalent to compare an Israeli soldier or soldiers going after a Palestinian hideaway or bomb-making home, to a terrorist going after a school bus filled with children.

"There is no equivalency between defending your nation and using horrific forces of terror to torture and maim."

There has been a shift in the last 40 or 50 years in terms of who traditionally have been friends of Israel and who are currently friends of Israel, he said.

Organizations and countries that supported Israel in the past often had the strongest socialist policies, he said.

"Leftist groups supported Israel because Israel was always identified as the victim. After the 1967 Six Day War everything changed, because it was evident that Israel was no longer the underdog. Israel was recognized not only for its military accomplishments, but also for its advances in technology, agriculture, and research and in the arts.

"Israel's friends on the left began to dissipate and Israel began to be more and more alone," he said.

The Palestinians became the new victims in need of sympathy, he said.

"However, the concerns of the Palestinians too often have been used as an excuse to legitimize the undemocratic and often violent terrorist acts of certain factions of the Palestinian leadership."

Canada must strictly monitor its millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinian Authority as long as that money goes towards the manufacture of children's textbooks filled with hatred towards Jews, Day said.

He questioned why the Canadian government gives money to the Palestinian coast guard while Canadian national defence is lacking in financial support.

As a democratic country, Canada has an obligation to take a public stand against oppressive regimes that advocate terrorism. The power of the spoken word cannot be underestimated, Day said.

We are hardwired for religion, neuroscientist says

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The brain's ability to instinctively seek answers to the things it cannot explain forms the neurological basis for belief systems, says neuroscientist Dr. Sandra Witelson.

The brain is programmed to draw conclusions based on the stimuli to which it is exposed, by "myth-making," or creating stories, Witelson said in a lecture titled "Neurology of Beliefs: Homo Mythopoesis."

The neurological basis of belief systems is similar in all religions, she said at McMaster University on Dec. 1, in the Ben Meyer Memorial Lecture, sponsored by the Herb and CeCe Schreiber Family Foundation, the Jewish Community Centre of Hamilton-Wentworth and Area, and McMaster University.

Witelson is professor of psychiatry and behavioural neurosciences at McMaster and holds the Albert Einstein/Irving Zucker chair in neuroscience. Her area of research concerns the neurobiological underpinnings of the functional differences of regions of the human brain. Her work has addressed dyslexia, the language neural network, sex differences in the brain structure, sexual orientation and the study of the brain of Albert Einstein.

Witelson coined the term homo mythopoesis, meaning "myth-making man," after what she considers to be the defining characteristic of man, the inborn instinct to interpret situations.

She said myth-making, or filling in the gaps where information is lacking, is a personalized perception of the environment and is a general characteristic of the human mind. It is not learned behaviour; it is the way the brain functions.

Studies of people with brain damage have shown that there is a natural tendency to make up stories to account for the stimulation that is experienced. This tendency to make myths is developed by a network in the left hemisphere of the brain, which is important for language.

Witelson said the human mind interprets the environment on a daily basis, in order to fill in the gaps the brain perceives, whether for simple things or for abstract issues like death.

When people are faced with inexplicable events such as personal tragedies, they look for some explanation or rationalization to account for what occurred. This explanation is often tied to a religious belief system, she said.

In an interview with The CJN, Witelson said mankind has always made up stories to account for things over which there is no explanation.

"What I'm adding is hard data from the behaviour of people with brain dysfunction who act in a way that demonstrates this tendency."

Referring to how we establish belief systems, she made this comparison: "In science we put forward a hypothesis which is held until there is new data. Then the hypothesis is modified.

"Belief and hypothesis come from the same source, from our need and instinct to interpret… Belief is a solidified interpretation taken on faith."

Ottawa students get funding for Israel advocacy

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Compared to the activities of the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), pro-Israel advocacy on campus is failing, says the new director of the Jewish Students' Association, Hillel Ottawa (JSA).

Dov Ben-Reuven said setting up tables in university centres is great, but Jewish students need to launch more innovative programs to make Zionism a positive word on campus.

"It's pathetic," he said. "We're failing compared to the SPHR. Zionism is no longer a warm, fuzzy word."

At the University of Ottawa and Carleton University, the SPHR recently erected "apartheid walls" to symbolize Israel's security fence.

In response to such anti-Israel sentiment, the JSA applied for and received a $10,000 grant last spring from United Israel Appeal Federations of Canada (UIAFC) for Israel advocacy.

The JSA has hired 10 students to promote a more positive image of Israel among students at U of O and Carleton. Each student receives $250 up front and an additional $250 if they are asked to stay on for a second semester. They are required to attend training sessions and come up with program ideas.

"It's there for students to be proactive, not reactive – to promote Zionism and all things that have been hijacked on campus," Ben-Reuven said.

He said the grant money would also be used for a variety of other projects, including marketing materials and conferences, and added that there is also a need to get pro-Israel messages into campus newspapers.

Lance Davis, the director of National Jewish Campus Life UIAFC, said other Jewish student groups, such as those in Vancouver, are engaging in similar activities.

"There is an expectation that after [the groups] spend the money, they will provide a solid report on the investment on campus," Davis said, adding that the UIAFC wants to see the programs they've initiated and how they compare to other Israel advocacy programs.

Davis said students at some campuses have set up grassroots Zionist groups, such as the Young Zionist Partnership at York University. The UIAFC has also allocated money for a full-time Israel advocacy co-ordinator at the University of British Columbia and Simon Fraser University in Vancouver.

The type of programs that will be implemented in Ottawa are still unclear, but Ben-Reuven said the 10 students would not be taking an in-your-face approach.

"We're not going to be setting up blown-out buildings," he said, adding that he wants to educate students through programs such as the Israeli trivia quiz at last month's Israel Day put on by U of O's Hillel.

Davis agrees with that approach.

"Doing in-your-face events is a turn-off for a lot of people," he said. "It's not our job to tell other cultures and religions what's wrong with them."

Ben-Reuven said he doesn't just want his team to limit their message to campuses.

"We can have a lot of influence in the capital," he said. "Think how many MPs there are. Let's say you pick an MP and you don't bombard them [with information], but re-educate them."

Last year, Davis said, eight Jewish student associations including U of O's received $10,000 grants for campus advocacy, but UIAFC did not distribute the same funds this year because some groups were using the money for one event as opposed to a series of events throughout the year.

This year, any Israel advocacy groups can apply for a $2,000 grant for each event they host.

"We encourage groups to apply and re-apply for all their events," Davis said.

YFS president-elect cleared of violating spending rules

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Paul Cooper and his slate of candidates for student government, the first ever to be endorsed by Hillel at York University, have been cleared of allegations they violated campaign spending rules.

Cooper, who ran for president of the York Student Federation (YFS), swept last month's elections, with his 31-member Progress Not Politics (PNP) slate winning 27 seats.

The results are not official until they are ratified by the outgoing YFS council, which was set to take place Dec. 15.

The ratification was expected after the YFS elections committee ruled that Cooper's campaign literature expenses represented fair market value. Three committee members voted in Cooper's favour, and one abstained.

The decision was released last Monday afternoon, Dec. 8, after a nine-hour hearing four days earlier.

Three candidates had filed complaints before the election campaign was over.

"We fully expect our slate to be ratified, presuming there's no appeal," said Edward Prutschi, legal counsel to the PNP slate.

Saddam's capture just first step

BY LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

Israelis have a long score to settle with Saddam Hussein: the former Iraqi dictator promised to destroy the Jewish state, fired 39 Scud missiles at Israeli cities during the Persian Gulf War and paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to families of Palestinian suicide bombers.

Not surprisingly, therefore, Israelis were jubilant Sunday at the news of Saddam's capture by American forces in Iraq, a mood reflected by the Tel Aviv stock exchange, which rose more than three per cent on the day.

But seasoned Israeli analysts are less euphoric. While acknowledging a best-case scenario in which Saddam's capture spurs on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, puts pressure on Syria to seek a peace agreement and enhances Israel's strategic position in the region, they say that much still has to happen in Iraq for that scenario to materialize.

The key question, they say, is whether Saddam's capture leads to a significant reduction in the number of guerrilla attacks on U.S. and allied forces and leads to a more stable, pro-American Iraqi regime.

If that happens, the benefits for Israel could be enormous. But if the attrition and chaos continue, the positive impact of Saddam's capture could dissipate quickly.

On the face of it, Saddam's final, ignominious exit should put more pressure on the Palestinians to seek accommodation with Israel.

The radical Arab forces pressing the Palestinians to reject all peace offers have been weakened, and Saddam's capture further reduces the radical hinterland Palestinian hard-liners look to for support.

It also strengthens America's regional standing and adds weight to the U.S.-sponsored "road map" plan for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

But will the Americans, still embroiled in Iraq, have the resolve to exploit the moment to pressure both Palestinians and Israelis to move forward? Israeli cabinet ministers think not.

On the contrary, they expect American pressure on Israel to ease. Public Security Minister Tzachi Hanegbi, for example, believes the United States will now be "far more confident in carrying out its campaign against the 'Axis of Evil,'" and give Israel more leeway in fighting terror.

Any reduction of American pressure would be a problem, says analyst Yossi Alpher, co-editor of the Israeli-Palestinian Bitterlemons.org Web site and a former senior Mossad operative.

In Alpher's view, the capture of Saddam will only move the Israeli-Palestinian track forward if President George W. Bush follows it up by "knocking some heads together" on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian divide.

"But," says Alpher, "this is not the direction we are moving in. On the contrary, we are moving toward low-level crisis management throughout the U.S. election period and throughout the crisis in Iraq – and the U.S. is still facing a crisis in Iraq."

In congratulating Bush, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon suggested that Saddam's capture could herald the beginning of the end for dictatorships throughout the Middle East, with major strategic benefits for Israel.

In a veiled allusion to neighbouring Syria, Sharon said, "The dictatorships, and especially those tainted by terror, learned a historic lesson today: the enlightened international community showed that it can defend freedom and defeat terror when it has to."

But the analysts are skeptical about the chances of a democratic Iraq emerging from the chaos, let alone setting off a domino effect of democratization across the region.

Alpher says he does not believe Saddam's capture will have an appreciable impact on the terrorist attacks against U.S. forces in Iraq.

"After watching Saddam on television, my initial sense is that he has been in deep hiding and that he could not have been a major moving force in the guerrilla attacks," Alpher says. "And we all know that a good portion of the elements fighting the Americans in Iraq today have nothing to do with Saddam and the Ba'ath party."

Alpher points out that the Sunni Muslims who have ruled Iraq for 13 centuries are a minority, and even without Saddam to encourage and lead them, they fear that American-style democracy will lead to their removal from power, reason enough to continue a rearguard action to resist democracy.

"It takes a stretch of the imagination [to believe] that Saddam's capture is going to put the democratic domino effect back on track," Alpher says. "That, I don't see happening."

Still, Alpher says he sees major short-term strategic gains for America and Israel. Saddam's capture dramatically enhances America's credibility in the region, and that, he says, "is a boost for American deterrence and, by association, for Israeli deterrence too."

If, despite the questions being raised by the experts, the United States is able, within a year or so, to put into place a genuine, functioning democracy in Iraq, that would send a very important message across the Middle East. There's even an outside chance that a pro-American Iraq might seek relations with Israel.

And that, in turn, would be certain to have an impact on Bashar Assad's Syria. In a recent New York Times interview, Assad spoke of peace with Israel as a strategic choice his father had made, and one he intended to pursue.

A democratic Iraq at peace with Israel would give him added incentive. But, say the experts, capturing Saddam is only one step in that direction. There is still a long way to go.

Israelis joyful, Arab world mixed at capture

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

RAMAT GAN — After surviving the Holocaust and five Middle East wars, Ze'ev is a hard man to impress. But news of Saddam Hussein's capture Sunday moved the Israeli retiree to tears.

"It is good to see Israel a little bit safer," Ze'ev said in his hometown of Ramat Gan as footage of the Iraqi tyrant-turned-prisoner played on television screens at roadside snack stands.

Ramat Gan, where Iraqi Jewish emigrés settled en masse in the 1950s, was a main target of Saddam's Scud missiles in the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The capture of the only Arab leader to perpetrate an unanswered strike against the Jewish state created an upbeat reaction in Israel, buoying the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and resonating at the Defence Ministry.

"The capture of the Iraqi dictator is additional proof that the policies of the free world led by U.S. President George W. Bush are determined to bring to justice all terrorists responsible for killing, destruction and anarchy," Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz wrote in a telegram to his American counterpart, Donald Rumsfeld.

On Sunday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon also phoned Bush to offer congratulations.

The Arab leaders who still battle Israel were more circumspect.

Saddam's history with Israel

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Spewing anti-Israel vitriol was one of Saddam Hussein's specialties.

Of all the leaders in the Arab world, Saddam seemed to have the most to say against Israel and he seemed to say it the most often.

Now that he has been captured and faces possible trial, experts are asking whether or not the Jewish state will again be his target of choice.

"It will be interesting to see if he chooses to attack Israel this time – not with Scuds, but verbally," said Martin Kramer, a research fellow at Tel Aviv University's Dayan Center. "Historically, when he found himself up against the wall, his usual method was to divert and deflect attention to Israel."

After attacking Israel in the 1991 Gulf War, Hussein became fond of saying that the Iraqi people represented 22 million missiles against Israel.

It was Hussein's rhetoric against Israel that "was the main glue for the Iraqis for developing national Iraqi feelings, and remained so until the very end," said Ofra Bengio, a professor of Middle East history at Tel Aviv University. "Hussein wanted to be able to mobilize the population around Israel as the symbol of evil."

In 1969, soon after Saddam was appointed Iraq's vice-president, the government hanged 17 alleged spies, 11 of whom were Jewish, in what is perceived as Saddam's first message to Israel that he was a force with which to be reckoned.

The animosity continued in the 1970s, when Israel provided covert military training and support for Iraqi Kurds in their struggle against the regime in Baghdad. The enmity intensified in 1981 with Israel's airstrike on Iraq's nuclear facility at Osirak, outside of Baghdad.

Israeli officials defended the strike in the face of worldwide condemnation, arguing that Saddam's regime was attempting to develop nuclear weapons. Years later, some of the same voices that condemned Israel in 1981 said the strike had been the correct move.

Out of all the Iraqi-Israeli recriminations, Hussein was proudest of Iraq's firing of Scud missiles on the Jewish state. Casualties and damage from the attacks were minimal, but the rain of missiles caused Israelis trauma.

For the first time in the country's history, Israel did not strike back when attacked. Instead, the Israelis, many of them survivors of persecution elsewhere, hid in their sealed rooms with gas masks while the government heeded a request by the United States, which was trying to keep intact its alliance with the Arab world against Saddam, not to counterattack.

Saddam's power lay in part in his image and forceful rhetoric, said Bengio, author of Saddam's World. Saddam "managed to put Israeli society into a panic for more than a decade. There was no basis for such hysteria, but he managed to do it," she said.

But a serious Iraqi military threat never materialized, she said, because Saddam was on too bad terms with the Syrians and Jordanians to make common cause.

Making Israel the focus of his diatribes was politically profitable for Saddam. Presenting himself as a leader of the Arab world, Hussein could use anti-Israeli sentiment to rally Arabs behind him.

He was seen by many in the Arab street as a hero for taking bold stands against Israel and the United States. While other Arab nations entered into peace talks with Israel and acceded to U.S. pressure, Hussein stood firm with his belligerent stance.

The Palestinians cheered Saddam for supporting them, even when the Scuds he fired at Israel endangered them as well.

Israelis joyful

While Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, a longtime Saddam ally, mulled an official reaction to the news of the capture in Tikrit, Hamas and Islamic Jihad cautioned the West not to rejoice too soon.

"The Americans need to be the lords of the world by eradicating all resistance against them," said Adnan Asfour, a Hamas leader in the West Bank. "I say to the Iraqi people: Observe what the Palestinian people do. Our leaders are assassinated and arrested every day by the Israeli occupiers and that does not stop us from continuing our fight."

In the Gaza Strip border town of Rafah, which sees almost daily fighting between Palestinian gun-runners and Israeli troops, a rally to mark the 16th anniversary of Hamas' founding quickly became a show of support for Saddam.

Children bore posters showing Saddam in better days: uniformed, smiling, an unabashed patron of the Palestinian cause.

Israeli strategic experts agreed that while a quick trial and sentencing for Saddam might calm Iraq, it was unlikely to affect the Palestinian front.

Terrorist attacks against Israel continued even though Saddam's payments to the families of Palestinian suicide bombers stopped after he was deposed in March.

And unlike Saddam, Arafat still enjoys the status of international statesman in most places except Washington.

"What amazes me," said Yuval Steinitz, chair of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, "is that Saddam can now sit in shackles for his support of terrorism, while arch-terrorist Arafat remains free."

Some experts warned of a surge in violence by pan-Arab nationalists keen to show they are not cowed by the loss of a major figurehead.

"Those normal citizens who have taken up arms against the Americans in Iraq, and the Islamist extremists who have flocked to help them, might well put up a last fight," said Jacky Hugi, Arab affairs correspondent from Israel's daily Ma'ariv.

The parallels between the Iraqi and Palestinian fronts resonated recently with revelations that Israel was exporting its hard-learned counterterrorist tactics to U.S. forces operating in Iraq.

At least one Israeli analyst said he did not approve of the broadcasting of the videotape of Saddam undergoing a medical inspection after his capture.

"It's humiliating and inappropriate," said Moti Kedar of Bar-Ilan University. "You want to win over the Iraqis, not rub their faces in it."

Cotler wants Africa on 'Jewish agenda'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community should make the "urgent humanitarian catastrophe" in Africa part of a new "Jewish agenda," says Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Jews should be particularly sensitive to the awful tragedies besetting sub-Saharan Africa, such as the AIDS pandemic and bloody civil wars, said Cotler, who chaired the parliamentary sub-committee on human rights and international development.

"Our own normative ethics – the Talmud – says that whoever saves a single person, it is as if you saved an entire universe," said Cotler, who was in Toronto last week for a Liberal party fundraiser just prior to being named justice minister and attorney general in the new federal cabinet.

The Jewish community should "make [Africa] an issue when we make presentations to the government regarding the public agenda," he said.

"We also know from our own involvement with Ethiopian Jews [about] the crises facing Ethiopia and Africa as a whole."

Cotler said a report released last summer by his subcommittee called on Canada to take the lead in addressing Africa's deteriorating situation.

Most recently, he has urged the Liberal caucus and Prime Minister Paul Martin to make Africa "the most urgent priority for Canadian foreign policy… This is going to be the signature of our foreign policy."

Canada, he said, must press the international community to address AIDS, hunger, poverty, environmental degradation, armed conflict, violations of human rights and pillaging of resources.

Robert Fowler, former prime minister Jean Chrétien's personal representative for Africa and the G-8 summit, told the subcommittee that one in five Africans is currently engaged in conflict, and that nearly half of the 700 million people in sub-Saharan Africa live on less than $1 a day, and two-thirds of the world's 40 million HIV/AIDS victims live in the region.

Cotler said Martin is seeking input from caucus on his first throne speech, and Cotler said he is working to put Africa "on the radar screen."

Cotler said there are several ways Canada can help. First, it could triple its contribution to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, which acquires generic drugs. Canada can also work within global trade rules for the distribution of cheap generic AIDS-fighting drugs, he said.

Finally, Canada could boost its overseas development funding to seven per cent of GNP and press for the creation of a rapid deployment force to prevent massacres in troubled regions, such as the genocide in Rwanda, he said.

Pointing to the civil war in Sudan, where more than two million have been killed, Cotler said Canada can force its corporations to comply with international standards so as not to "facilitate the oiling of the military killing machine."

The Week in Israel

Dec. 8

- The UN General Assembly voted to send the issue of Israel's security barrier to the International Court of Justice. The General Assembly voted 90-8 to have the court address whether international law requires Israel to halt its construction.

Dec. 9

- Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hinted that some Jewish settlements could be evacuated regardless of peacemaking progress with the Palestinians. "Israel may move settlements that are across the Green Line for security without any connection to negotiations," Israel Radio quoted Sharon as telling the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, without providing details.

Dec. 10

- Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Geneva. The two reportedly discussed efforts to arrange a meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia.

Dec. 11

- Six Palestinians were killed and 15 injured as a result of Israel Defence Forces operations in Rafah. The six Palestinians died when the IDF returned heavy fire from Palestinian gunmen.
- Three people were killed and at least 30 were injured in a gangland Tel Aviv explosion apparently aimed at killing underworld kingpin Ze'ev Rosenstein, who escaped with slight injuries to his hand and leg.

Dec. 12

- Islamic Jihad and the Fatah-linked Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades both claimed responsibility for an attack that left seven people wounded at Joseph's Tomb in Nablus.

Canadian linked to Hamas denied bail

CJN News Services

A Canadian with alleged ties to Hamas is being held without bail by Israel on charges of conspiracy to commit murder and receiving illegal military training.

Jamal Akkal, 23, agreed to take part in a Hamas plot to "assassinate a senior Israeli official in the United States and attack members of the U.S. and Canadian Jewish communities," the charges allege.

Jamal Akkal, 23, has been in custody since Israel arrested him Nov. 1 as he tried to leave Gaza for Egypt.

The indictment alleges Hamas member Ahmed Wahabe told Akkal to await approval from senior group officials before carrying out the attacks, but it doesn't say if the approval was ever given.

Wahabe succeeded in recruiting Akkal after one of his relatives was killed in an Israeli army operation and he wanted to get revenge, the charge sheet stated. Wahabe met with Akkal in the Nusseirat camp in October and trained him to shoot an M-16 rifle and to prepare bombs, the military prosecutor charged.

But Akkal's lawyer, Jameel Khatib, denies the allegations, saying Wahabe was Akkal's neighbour.

Khatib, however, admits his client fired Wahabe's gun eight times, saying that is common practice in Gaza. He also said Akkal signed a confession after being deprived of sleep for 20 days.

Israel says Akkal was questioned according to Israeli law and not mistreated, and that its documents tell a different story than the one presented by his lawyer.

They say Akkal admitted meeting with Wahabe, "a senior Hamas terrorist," and agreed to "assist [Hamas] in Canada" by killing a visiting Israeli official. He was also asked to kill Jews, particularly in New York.

Wahabe trained Akkal in the use of an M-16 and instructed him in bomb-making, the documents state.

Israeli officials said such attacks, which Hamas planned to attribute to Al Qaeda, would have marked Hamas' first outside the Mideast.

Lt.-Col. David Binyamin, the military prosecutor, said there is plenty of evidence to corroborate Akkal's confession, including videotapes.

"The plan, as we understand from his statement [to police], was to find a person who looked Jewish by the skullcap or some other defining feature...and then go and attach a bomb to the door of the house [of that person]," Binyamin said.

IAEA chief ElBaradei calls on Israel to give up nuclear weapons

By YOSSI MELMAN

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), Mohamed ElBaradei, has called on Israel to relinquish its nuclear weapons as part of a general peace agreement in the Middle East.

In an interview with Ha'aretz – his first interview with the Israeli media – ElBaradei said Israel should follow the path taken by South Africa, the first and only country to get rid of its nuclear cache. Its weapons were destroyed under IAEA supervision in 1989.

ElBaradei also said Israel should join the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Despite Israel's policy of not acknowledging possession of nuclear weapons, "we operate under the assumption that Israel has nuclear arms. Israel has never denied this," he said from his office at Vienna headquarters of the UN organization.

The senior UN diplomat said the notion Israel is safer today with nuclear weapons than it was 50 years ago is incorrect.

"I am not happy with the status quo, because I see a lot of frustration in the Middle East due to Israel's sitting on nuclear weapons or nuclear weapons capability, while other in the Middle East are committed to the NPT," he said.

There's a limit to how much you can give.

Starting on January 1, 2004, new rules governing federal political financing will set out clear limits for everyone.

- As a Canadian citizen or permanent resident of Canada, you can give up to $5,000 in total per year to each registered political party, including its registered riding associations, nomination contestants and candidates.
- You can also give up to $5,000 in total to the leadership contestants of a registered party per leadership race, and $5,000 per election to each candidate who is not of a registered party.
- The maximum tax credit has been increased to $650 for eligible political contributions.
- Corporations and trade unions (with some exceptions) can give up to $1,000 per year in total to the candidates, nomination contestants and registered riding associations of each registered political party, and can give up to $1,000 per election to each candidate who is not of a registered party.
- Corporations and trade unions cannot make contributions to the registered parties themselves or to their leadership contestants.

German politicians debate anti-Semitism

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Seventy years ago, Germany was concerned with its "Jewish problem." Today, Germany is concerned with its anti-Semitism problem.

In a wide-ranging, two hour debate on anti-Semitism in Germany's Parliament last Thursday, legislators agreed that the country must fight antipathy toward Jews both on society's fringes and among Germans generally.

Their solution: education.

The debate, co-sponsored by all the major political parties, was prompted by the recent scandal over an anti-Semitic speech made by Parliament member Martin Hohmann, a member of the Christian Democratic Party.

In an Oct. 3 speech, Hohmann said Jews could be seen as a "nation of perpetrators" because of their actions in the 1917 Russian Revolution. He has since been thrown out of the party.

A recent study by the University of Bielefeld indicates that nearly 70 per cent of Germans say they are tired of being held responsible for the Holocaust and 25 per cent believe that Jews use the history of that period for their own benefit.

It also showed that 25 per cent of Germans have a far-right populist orientation, up from nearly 20 per cent the year before. According to reports, there was a similar increase in right-wing motivated crimes in the past year.

At the debate, some lambasted Christian Democratic representatives for not coming down harder on Hohmann.

Wolfgang Thierse, a member of the Social Democratic Party and the president of the Bundestag, Germany's parliament, said it is important for Germans to fight anti-Semitism because of the country's history and because such hatred "is undemocratic and damages basic human rights."

It has nothing to do with "the passing along of guilt from generation to generation," Thierse said.

Legislator Norbert Lammert said the debate is necessary because "there still is anti-Semitism in Germany," though Germany actually has fewer problems with anti-Semitism than many other European countries.

Many others echoed that last point.

Jewish life in Germany is blooming, said Wolfgang Boetsch, who noted the signing of an official agreement between the government and the Central Council of Jews in Germany as well as the planned construction of a new community centre in Munich.

But "there is also another reality," Boetsch said. "The start of open anti-Semitism. School classes must hear about Jewish culture and life to support this new chapter with our fellow citizens of the Jewish faith."

Volker Beck of the Green Party said many Germans believe Jews are the primary beneficiaries of a compensation fund for victims of Nazi slave labour, when in fact 80 per cent of the beneficiaries are not Jewish.

"Israel has become the collective Jew of the nations," said legislator Gert Weisskirchen, referring to criticism of the Jewish state. While criticism of Israel is legitimate, he said, comparing Israel to the Nazi regime reawakens the "nightmare of anti-Semitism."

Weisskirchen called the demonizing of Israel "the most dangerous development," and said warning signs can be seen in places like Paris, where extremists promote hatred of Jews.

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, said those signs are not taken seriously enough.

Testifying in October before the European subcommittee of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Harris said that except for Germany, requests to persuade European leaders to focus on anti-Semitism "had fallen on deaf ears."

At the end of the two-hour debate, legislators voted unanimously to condemn anti-Semitism.

But some legislators were upset that the debate did not explicitly condemn Hohmann and his remarks.

A 27-year-old police officer from Ratzeburg, who attended the session with a group of fellow officers, said the subject of anti-Semitism is often discussed among police "because sometimes we have to deal with right-wing extremists."

Another observer, Christian Cetoyefiz, a high school student, said the debate was "good, because it is important to look into the future and not always at the past."

Several speakers at the session noted the widespread lack of interest among young Germans in Holocaust history. Some resent being reminded of past crimes, they said.

But, Lammert said, "We are responsible for what is learned from the past, and I have no doubt that German youth take that responsibility very seriously."

Chanukah Foods

Life's delicacies should always be Kosher by Design

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Suzy Fishbein, author of Kosher by Design and co-editor of The Kosher Palette, attributes the success of her two books to the fact that she is not a professional cook.

The Long Island wife and stay-at-home mother of four says she is a regular person who cooks in a regular kitchen.

"I like cooking to be fun, and I look for recipes that have maximum esthetic impact with a minimum of fuss. I want to get bang for my buck."

In her new book, she says, "I don't aim for the level of chef. I'm not a chef and no one I know cooks like a chef.

"I'm aiming at people who cook every day – people who want things to look elegant but don't want to spend seven hours in the kitchen."

Her recipes are unusual but easy, she says. "It's not a one-two-three book; there are some longer recipes. They're not complicated, however. No one has to feel intimidated."

At a tasting party she held to test recipes, she invited people to partake in a buffet of dishes and then had them fill out an evaluation form.

Greek tomato-spinach pizza

"I got a number of ideas from my 'guests' and then perfected the recipes. Subsequently, I hired a professional tester for the checks and balances so I was sure how good each recipe really was."

To her family, she says, cooking is about socializing. "We do love going out, but we also love gravitating around the cook. My kids always cook with me; they find it nurturing and exciting. I have the only three-year-old that can tell the difference between flour and sugar."

In organizing her book, she says, she divided it by holiday, and before giving meal and presentation ideas, explained the origin and customs of each holiday.

"Food is so much a part of the Jewish holidays that it enriches the experience to tie the food into the holiday traditions, she says.

"In Kosher by Design, we tried to pair foods with the holiday. Any recipe, though, can be used for any holiday, any night, any Shabbat," she says.

For Chanukah, she writes, there is no better way to present a meal than by setting your table aglow with candles. "The incredible variety of candles available can be tailored to fit any colour, scheme or mood."

After explaining how to make each place setting resemble a wrapped present – "this is simpler than it looks" – Fishbein says that "to commemorate the Chanukah miracle of oil, the menu opens and closes with a sizzle."

She offers such recipes as cajun sweet potato latkes, parmesan-crusted grouper, a pasta dish that highlights fried eggplant and a Greek tomato-spinach pizza "that is sure to delight young and old," she writes.

PARMESAN-CRUSTED GROUPER

½ cup grated Parmesan cheese
⅓ cup butter, softened, not melted
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
2 scallions, thinly sliced
2 large or 4 small (1-inch-thick) grouper fillets
1 lemon
freshly ground black pepper

Preheat broiler to high. In a small bowl, combine the Parmesan, butter, mayonnaise and scallions. Set aside. Place the grouper fillets on a lightly greased broiler pan. Squeeze the juice from one lemon over the fillets and sprinkle with black pepper. Broil 6 inches from heat for 10 minutes. Remove from oven. Spread the tops of the fillets with cheese mixture. Return to oven and broil for 2 minutes longer or until the topping is lightly browned and bubbly. Remove fillets to platter. Yield: 4 servings.

RIGATONI ALA NORMA

Asian eggplants are light purple, narrow and slightly sweet. They can be found in Asian markets or at upscale supermarkets. They are not as bitter as their American counterparts, which makes them perfect for this recipe. It is important to salt the eggplants; this drains them of water and keeps the eggplant slices from soaking up the olive oil or becoming soggy. As a point of interest, most people think eggplants are a vegetable. However, they are a fruit, in particular, a berry.

6 medium Asian eggplants, unpeeled and cut into ½-inch-thick slices salt
1¼ cups or more olive oil, divided
freshly ground black pepper
4 large cloves garlic, roughly chopped
2 (28- to 32-oz.) cans whole plum tomatoes, drained and chopped
1 tbsp. sugar
3-4 fresh basil leaves, chopped
1 lb. rigatoni, uncooked
fresh basil leaves

Lay the eggplant slices in a single layer. Lightly salt both sides. Cover with paper towel and let sit for 20 minutes. Press on the paper towel occasionally to soak up the water.

In a large pan, heat 1 cup (or more) of olive oil over medium-high heat. Make sure you have at least an inch of oil so it will cover the slices of eggplant and eliminate the need for flipping each piece over. When oil is very hot, carefully add the eggplant in batches and fry until golden on both sides. Drain and transfer to a paper. Season generously with salt and black pepper.

Place the ¼ cup oil in a large pot. Add the garlic and sauté until golden. Add the tomatoes and any accumulated juices. Add the sugar and simmer about 15 minutes; the sauce will thicken. Add the basil and simmer 3-4 minutes longer.

While sauce is simmering, prepare the pasta according to directions until al dente. Drain, reserving 1 cup of the pasta water in case the sauce needs a little thinning. Toss the pasta with the eggplant and sauce. Garnish with fresh basil leaves. Yield: 6-8 servings.

GREEK TOMATO-SPINACH PIZZA

¼ cup olive oil
2 cups chopped onion
3 garlic cloves, minced
3 (10-oz.) boxes frozen chopped spinach, thawed and squeezed dry
2 tsp. dry oregano
½ cup chopped fresh basil
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
15 oz. ricotta cheese
10 sheets phyllo dough, thawed
¼ cup (½ stick) butter, melted
4-6 fresh tomatoes, evenly sliced
1½ cups grated mozzarella cheese

Preheat the oven to 400. In a skillet, heat the olive oil over medium heat. Add the onion and garlic; sauté about 5 minutes or until onions are translucent. Add the spinach and sauté until all excess moisture has evaporated. Add oregano, basil and black pepper. Mix well; remove from heat. Mix in the ricotta cheese; set aside.

Grease a large jelly roll pan (the kind with a small rim). Lay one sheet of phyllo in it; the phyllo may be just a little bigger than the pan. Brush the sheet of phyllo with melted butter. Top with the second sheet of phyllo and brush with melted butter. Repeat the process until all 10 sheets are buttered. Roll the ends of overlapping phyllo onto itself to form the "pizza crust."

Using a spatula, spread the spinach ricotta mixture in an even layer over the phyllo. Arrange the tomatoes over this layer. Sprinkle with the mozzarella. Bake 25-30 minutes or until golden brown. Yield: 12 servings.

Snack program geared to serving kids healthy food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Students at Pineway Public School have discovered that there is more to snack food than chips and candy.

The students are learning first-hand about the value of good nutrition, thanks to volunteers on the National Council of Jewish Women's food for learning committee.

Every morning at recess, the volunteers provide a nourishing snack to the 125 children – they speak more than 100 languages – who have signed on to the program,which is funded jointly by NCJW and the school.

Committee members Marcy Fish and Ellen Erenberg said they try to provide reasonably priced, easy-to-prepare snacks such as half of a multi-grain bagel, cream cheese and a mandarin orange.

Two or three times a year, they said, they also serve a vegetable and dip platter to each class.

"It is our way of introducing new foods to these students. We're always amazed that the kids like it so much they come back for more broccoli."

Erenberg shops for the snacks, and two different volunteers go to the school every morning to serve it.

"It is a wonderful project," she said. "There has been research done on children's learning habits, and it has been discovered that major learning is done in the morning. If students have not had breakfast, they learn less."

Fish added, "The City of Toronto recognized us with a certificate of recognition for outstanding community service, and the teachers have commented that the children's behaviour has changed for the better since the snack program was implemented."

The volunteers were touched when one class wrote that they enjoyed "the colourful and healthy foods. As you know, most of our classmates come from Asia and we cook the vegetables for a long time. Now we [have a better way to prepare] our food. This way, we can make our family and friends healthier."

Also at Pineway, NCJW has established a reading program, Reading Angels, in which volunteers spend one hour a week reading and writing with individual students, many of whom are struggling to learn English.

"When students improve their reading skills, their self-esteem goes way up. One child was a behavioural problem at the beginning of the year, but as his reading improved, he became a different child," Fish said. "Our volunteers bond with their 'students' and they feel rewarded as they watch them learn."

Children have the right to proper nutrition and the right to learn to read, Erenberg added.

"It is an investment in their future."

Latkes: the ‘in’ food, not only at Chanukah

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

To most Jews, Chanukah means latkes. A short while ago, kasha was becoming one of the “in” foods in America. Now there is another “in” food – latkes, the quintessential Chanukah dish. Latkes are getting attention everywhere. They’re showing up not only in books, magazines and newspapers, but also in restaurants and catering operations.

They are served as hors d’oeuvres, as side dishes and as appetizers. They are being made with ingredients such as truffle peelings, fresh spinach, finely diced carrots and red peppers or smoked salmon. North American hostesses are passing tiny latkes around on silver trays at cocktail parties with sour cream and caviar.

It seems the world is discovering what we Jews have known for ages – the delicious temptation of latkes. The sizzle of Chanukah begins and ends with potato latkes.

The key to making latkes is to use potatoes that are high in starch and low in moisture, like russet potatoes.

The second most important thing is to have your oil hot. If it is not, your latkes will soak up a lot of oil and most likely stick to the bottom of the pan.

Let the oil heat until heat until ripples begin to form, but don’t let the oil smoke. The potato mixture should immediately begin to fry when you add it to the pan.

When the latkes are golden brown, remove them from the pan and drain them on crumpled paper towels. To save cleanup time I like to place several thicknesses of newspaper on my kitchen counter then cover that with crumpled paper towels. The reason for crumpling the paper towels is so that the latkes don’t sit on the greasy paper and re-absorb the oil.

You can make the latkes ahead of time and store them in a single layer, covered, on a baking sheet. When you are ready to serve them, uncover and reheat in an oven that has been preheated to 350.

POTATO-VEGETABLE LATKES

An excellent way to use up leftover mashed potatoes and vegetables. You can use any vegetable you choose.

1 large egg, beaten
2-3 cups leftover mashed potatoes
salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. finely chopped onion
1 cup chopped cooked leftover vegetables (green beans, spinach, cabbage, carrots, etc.)
1 cup or more seasoned breadcrumbs
oil for frying

Add the beaten egg to the leftover mashed potatoes. Add the salt and pepper, onions and vegetables. Form little cakes about 2 inches in diameter. Roll in bread crumbs and fry in oil until the outsides are crispy and brown. Serves 6.

MIXED VEGETABLE LATKES

You can substitute any cooked vegetables you have on hand in these latkes. They are good served with mushroom sauce.

½ cup chopped onion
½ cup chopped celery
½ cup grated carrots
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
½ cup cooked green beans, coarsely chopped
½ cup cooked or canned green peas, chopped or slightly mashed
3 eggs, beaten
salt and pepper to taste
4 tbsp. flour or matzah meal

Saute onion, celery and carrots in butter or margarine for 10 minutes over low heat. Add green beans, peas, eggs, salt and pepper and flour or matzah meal. Mix well and drop by heaping teaspoonfuls into hot oil. Batter will be a little stiff. Fry until browned on both sides and remove to crumpled paper towels to drain. Makes 12 latkes.

SWEET POTATO LATKES

2 eggs, beaten
1 tbsp. dark brown sugar
1 tsp. apple pie spice or cinnamon
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
4½ cups shredded sweet potatoes, divided
½ cup matzah meal
oil for frying

Puree eggs, brown sugar, apple pie spice, salt and pepper in food processor until smooth. Add 2 cups sweet potatoes and pulse-puree for 15-20 seconds. Transfer mixture to a medium-sized bowl and stir in remaining sweet potatoes and matzah meal.

Put about 1 in. oil in a large, heavy skillet. Heat oil over medium-high heat. Form ¼ cup mixture into pancakes and gently slide into oil. Let cook 6-8 minutes or until golden on one side. Turn pancakes and continue cooking for 6-8 minutes longer or until golden. Drain on crumpled paper towels. Makes 16 latkes.

What to do with the leftovers after the party is over

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

What do you do when the office Chanukah party is over and you still have plenty of potato pancakes or scads of sandwiches?

There are people who'd appreciate the leftovers, but you have to know where to find them – and quickly, because perishable food deteriorates.

Second Harvest, a self-described "perishable food recovery program," serves 141 different food programs in the Greater Toronto area, according to "food raiser" (not fund raiser) Kate Thrasher. Of those programs, at least seven request kosher food.

Second Harvest drivers pick up and deliver perishable food to places like community kitchens and shelters.

Food should have been stored properly and not be past its expiry date, said Thrasher. To facilitate matters during the holiday season when there are a lot of pickups following office parties, Thrasher suggested calling three or four hours ahead (preferably the morning of the party), and having food packaged and ready to go.

A recent survey of Second Harvest agencies indicated their need for food has increased by an average of 23.8 percent over the past year, she said.

Jared Bensky of GMB Culinary Productions often takes leftover food to a homeless shelter. "If the host or hostess doesn't want to take all the [usable] food home, we'll never throw anything out," he says. "We like to give back to the community."

He said he also works closely with Mazon Canada: A Jewish Response to Hunger. The organization collects and distributes money to organizations that provide food. Its Web site includes a list of such organizations across Canada, where people can donate perishable and non-perishable food items. The list can be found at www.mazoncanada.ca/wheretodonate.html.

The native men's residence Na-Me-Res – with which Ve'ahavta has teamed up for its Street Help program – also accepts perishable food, both for residents and for homeless people who receive soup and sandwiches from the Street Help van. "I think we use everything that comes in," said kitchen manager Francine Mendoshkin.

Chai Tikvah, a home for people with mental illness, accepts kosher food only, said Margalit Meidan, senior counsellor. "It's very much appreciated by the residents."

To donate perishable food in the Toronto area, contact:

Chai Tikvah 416-665-0482,
Second Harvest, 416-408-2594, or
Na-Me-Res 416-652-3138

Elsewhere in Ontario, organizations that accept perishable food include:

Hamilton Kosher Food Bank 905-648-0605 (accepts some perishable food), London Food Bank 519-659-4045, and
Ottawa Food Bank 613-745-7001

Organizations in Toronto that take non-perishable food include:

Beth Sholom Synagogue (kosher) 416-783-6103
Daily Bread Food Bank 416-203-0050
North York Harvest Food Bank 416-635-7771

Jessica Greenberg tackles Richler's Jacob Two-Two

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

After four years of studying acting in New York City, and performing off-Broadway, Jessica Greenberg is back in Toronto, appearing in Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People(LKTYP).

Greenberg, a Thornhill resident, plays Emma Richler and Emma's alter ego, The Intrepid Shapiro, in the action-packed musical about Jacob's encounter with the Hooded Fang and his escape from Slimer's Island.

Directed by Allen MacInnis, and featuring Yanick Allwood as Jacob, the show runs at LKTYP until Jan. 4 and marks the 25th anniversary of the classic Mordecai Richler musical at the theatre.

Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang has not only been acclaimed by the critics but it's also a hit with its target audience – children.

The cast performs the show at LKTYP as well as in schools, where question-and-answer sessions follow the play. At the sessions, the children's excitement is palpable, Greenberg says.

"The best feeling is to see a child I've never met get excited about the show."

Greenberg regrets that she can't see the show – "a fantastic, wonderful play," she says – from the audience's point of view. "Sometimes I'm sad I can't go out into the audience and watch."

Greenberg's background includes acting, singing and dance, a solid foundation for a thespian. She started acting while in elementary school and at age 14 performed in amateur productions of the musical Gypsy and the drama The Children's Hour, for which she won an award.

A participant in competitive gymnastics until she was 16, she majored in dance at the Toronto performing-arts high school, Earl Haig Secondary School.

While at Montreal's McGill University, taking political science and women's studies and performing in university productions and musical theatre in Montreal, Greenberg got serious about acting. "After my third year, I decided to focus on my career as an actor," she says.

She went on to study acting at Circle In The Square Theatre School in New York City, where she appeared off-Broadway.

About living in New York for four years away from her family, the 20-something actor says,"It was an unbelievable life experience, interesting and at times very alienating."

She also spent a summer as an apprentice at the Actors Theatre of Louisville, Ky., which is known for producing new American works.

Greenberg is not the first in her family to be bitten by the theatre or performance bug. Her father, Joel, a theatre professor at the University of Waterloo, is an actor and writer. He recently founded the Toronto theatre company, Studio 180. Her mother, Phyllis Angel, a trained singer, is a cantor at Congregation Darchei Noam.

Growing up, Greenberg attended Darchei Noam's supplementary school, whose original classes took place in the Greenbergs' basement. When the school outgrew the basement, it moved to another location.

Now that Greenberg is back in Canada – she says that New York City is not a place she wanted to settle down in, although she would be happy to return if she got an acting job there – she hopes to keep auditioning, keep acting, and eventually work in different theatres across the country. So far, her Canadian appearances have been limited to Toronto, Montreal and Waterloo.

"I'm young, I don't have family ties holding me and I think it would be great to do some travelling,' she says.

Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang runs until Jan. 4. For tickets, call the LKTYP box office at 416-862-2222. Schedule and on-line tickets at www.lktyp.ca. Ticket prices range from $18 to $28.

Robert Lantos opts for intelligent films

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

It's refreshing to hear one of Canada's most accomplished film producers admit that love, not money, drives his projects.

While Hollywood aims for box office bonanzas, Robert Lantos opts for serious films that are as intelligent as they are adventurous.

"I need to be challenged," Lantos, 53, said on the phone from New York, where he was opening his latest film, The Statement, directed by Canadian Norman Jewison and starring Michael Caine.

"I know serious films can be an uphill battle, but I do it for love."

His latest project is an ideal example. After reading Brian Moore's book The Statement seven years ago – he calls it "a compelling page-turner" – Lantos was determined to bring the story to the screen.

He said he was drawn to the tension boiling inside antagonist Pierre Brossard, a war criminal on the run in France. Particularly poignant for Lantos was the Holocaust thread, which weighs on Brossard's guilty conscience.

But the producer is quick to point out that The Statement differs from Holocaust-themed movies such as his Genie Award-winning Sunshine.

"This is relevant today, with rampant anti-Semitism in France," he said.

"As a filmmaker, it's a privilege to do something about what disturbs me the most, and anti-Semitism is foremost on that list."

Already, Oscar buzz is swirling around the film, particularly Caine's excellent portrayal of a man darkened by his past but motivated to survive by any means necessary.

"[Caine] found a way to make Brossard human," Lantos said.

Lantos was also able to attract other veteran talent to the film. Besides Jewison and Caine, it includes Stratford regular William Hutt, Alan Bates, John Neville and Charlotte Rampling, who is wonderful as Brossard's wife.

Working with top-notch people is nothing new for Lantos.

After shaping Alliance Communications – which later merged with rival Atlantis – into one of Canada's leading film and television companies, he teamed with premier Hollywood North directors such as David Cronenberg (Crash, eXistenZ), Denys Arcand (Stardom) and his most frequent filmmaking partner, Atom Egoyan (Ararat, Felicia's Journey, The Sweet Hereafter).

A glance at Lantos's production credits — which also include Black Robe, Exotica, Whale Music, and Joshua Then and Now — show that he tends to be involved with films you won't see featured on Entertainment Tonight.

A Lantos film is either so unusual it attracts eyeballs through sheer originality, or it's so honest that critics can't help but stick their thumbs way up.

The wider industry has also taken note of Lantos' achievements — five of his films have won Genie Awards, and The Sweet Hereafter was nominated for two Academy Awards. The quirky Crash also garnered appeal overseas by winning the Special Jury prize at the Cannes Film Festival, and other Lantos films have been lauded with European film awards.

The Jewish community also appreciates Lantos's contributions, as exemplified by a Maccabi Canada dinner in his honour at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto in October. An ardent Maccabi supporter, Lantos played water polo on the Canadian championship team and represented Canada at the 1969 Maccabiah games.

Before the black ties and business handshakes, the Budapest-born Lantos studied film at McGill University. At 24, he founded the Montreal-based distribution company Vivafilm, and produced his first film, L'Ange et la Femme, four years later.

When he founded Alliance, the arts community welcomed a strong and dedicated presence. Focusing on both film and television, the company produced such iconic shows as North of 60, ENG and Due South (he later reunited with star Paul Gross in the curling comedy Men With Brooms).

Post writer pens pregnancy guide for party girls

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Not all women can talk openly about morning sickness, but not all women are Rebecca Eckler.

Using a youthful, first-person writing style, the popular reporter has revealed many personal details about herself in her quirky National Post column since the paper's launch five years ago. So it came as no surprise when she was quite candid with Post readers about what it's like to be pregnant.

But her fans are in for more.

Disheartened by the advice she found in many pregnancy books, which she felt weren't written for modern women, the 31-year-old first-time mom decided to write her own book about her experiences.

To be released this May, Knocked Up: Confessions of a Party Girl on Perrier is a diary that boldly covers everything from conception to the many ups and downs of pregnancy.

"Basically, it's the truth about what being pregnant is really like," says Eckler, who gave birth to her daughter Rowan in October.

She said that when she first found out she was pregnant, she was wholly unprepared for the ordeal, especially since it was unplanned.

"Once I knew for sure, I was in shock. I'm still in shock. The whole thing is still so surreal," she says.

While reading up on maternity life, she discovered some books were preachy, to the point of being off-putting.

"They make you feel awful if you dare have a sip of Diet Coke. Knocked Up is more of a book that shows me trying to fit pregnancy into my life as opposed to my life ending because I'm pregnant. My book is more like, 'God I had such a bad day. I had a Diet Coke. Sue me.'"

One bit of advice that made her particularly resentful said women should throw out their tank tops because a mother-to-be isn't going to want to look at her arms.

"Screw that! Why should being pregnant stop me from wearing what I want? Pregnant women these days still want to have a fun life, dress well, look good and don't want the pregnancy to change their lives entirely," Eckler says.

The only way to get through pregnancy, she writes, is to have a bit of a sense of humour about it. "Some of the things that happen to a woman's body are so horrific that you can only laugh about it. I had morning sickness for the first three months, but at all times of the day. Shiny hair? I don't think so. That glow? Nope."

Eckler cautions that there are so many things that occur to an expectant mother that few people really know about until it's too late.

"Cravings totally took over my life for the first six months. I just kept eating. Oh, and don't even get me started on the hormones!"

And being pregnant was both the best of times and the worst of times, she says.

"Everyone leads you to believe that pregnancy is the most wonderful thing – the books do too – but that's only because the end result is so amazing. Yes, the end result is amazing, but those nine months were the longest, worst nine months of my life."

For the first three months, Eckler was a little superstitious that something would go wrong, and so she kept mum about the big announcement.

As a reporter, Eckler, the self-described "party girl," has garnered assignments that allow her to hobnob with celebrities, rub elbows with trendsetters, and attend killer parties.

While still partying, she had to come up with various excuses for her friends as to why she wasn't drinking. She used all the classics: not feeling well, having to get up early and being on medication.

"It was so difficult because I would still go out to bars with friends and everyone was like, 'You're not drinking! What's wrong?'"

But she thinks most of her friends suspected anyway. As for the Perrier in the book title, the beverage became her preferred social drink while pregnant.

Rebecca Eckler

Now that the secret – and the baby – are out, having Rowan is "the most amazing thing," Eckler says.

"It puts things into perspective, that a career is not the be all and end all."

Asked whether her daughter will grow up under a microscope, with a famous mom writing about her, Eckler says, "I promise to stop writing about Rowan by the time she can read."

Documentary compares conflicts in Jerusalem and Belfast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jerusalem and Belfast share at least one sombre, unsettling similarity.

Both cities have been, and still are, torn by endemic violence and terrorism born of religious and national conflicts.

Wailing Walls, a TVOntario film being aired Dec. 24 at 10 p.m., is narrated by Israeli journalist Yehuda Litani.

The juxtaposition is interesting. Litani is an Israeli who has come to Northern Ireland to study the forces of hatred and fear that convulse his own country.

As he discovers during his journey of enlightenment, the parallels between Northern Ireland and Israel are disquieting.

Both sides cling to myths to bolster their historical claims. Both have been shaped by pain. Both have no alternative but to share the land.

And in each instance, the absence of mutual trust is palpable, and the enemy is faceless.

Judging by Litani's encounters, Protestants are more likely to sympathize with Israel than Roman Catholics.

"We feel we're in the same situation of the Israeli people," a Protestant man says.

Given Litani's belief that the peace process in Northern Ireland is more advanced that it currently is in Israel, he concludes with the succinct observation that while Jerusalem is still "a slave to its past," Belfast is actively trying to break free.

'I do it for love,' Robert Lantos says about filmmaking

But being a CEO and chairman took its toll, and Lantos sold Alliance in 1998 to make films with his new boutique production company, Serendipity Point Films.

Lantos said the corporate life was never the path he wanted to take. "I don't want to spend my life being a CEO. I want to have fun making movies I believe in."

On the advantages of working with Serendipity rather than the larger Alliance, Lantos said, "For one thing, there are no more shareholders, so that's saving a headache. And there's less administration with running a company of 12 people rather than 600."

To those wondering why a producer, working mostly behind the scenes should be praised for his contributions, consider Lantos's analogy. "I'm captain of the ship. First on board, last one off," he said.

After securing the rights to a novel, a producer may dedicate years to developing a screenplay and attaching key actors to a project.

"It's a long process of seduction... And then I have to attract financiers," Lantos said.

But for him, it's all worth it.

"I'm involved in the creative process, that's what I love. I'm addicted to this business, to filmmaking. I couldn't live without it."

An intimate evening with Sky and Jordan

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Throughout their recent two-hour concert at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, singer/songwriters Amy Sky and Marc Jordan were able to convince each person in the packed hall that they were getting a private show.

The husband and wife duo, who headlined "The Evening of Music and Song" sponsored by Temple Har Zion, chatted casually and shared tidbits from their lives with the audience.

They also sang songs together – Temple Har Zion cantorial soloist Tara Abrams shared the stage for one number – and individually in an intimate "living room"-style performance.

Funds raised from the concert are earmarked for Temple Har Zion's capital campaign.

Dan Goldberg, vice-president of the 32-year-old temple, said it's raising funds to build and grow in order to accommodate the increasing needs of its members and the communities it serves, such as the Interfaith Mosaic and the Out of the Cold program.

During the concert, Sky, a Toronto native who graduated from the University of Toronto's faculty of music, and the New York-born Jordan, whose father was once a part-time cantor at Holy Blossom Temple, performed songs that reflected different aspects of their lives.

Sky said she wrote Ordinary Miracles after she and Jordan became parents. The simple, poignant lyrics about children's various stages of life really hit listeners, especially parents, in the heart.

Another of Sky's hits, I Will Take Care of You, about a mother and daughter, spoke to anyone with aging parents.

Leading into Living in Marina Del Rey, Jordan said many of his lyrics revolve around male loneliness and despair. Men don't talk to other men, he said, and often lead isolated lives.

Many people might be surprised at how many familiar hits have been penned by both Sky and Jordan.

Sky, whose songs range from jazz to contemporary pop, has written or co-written songs for such singers as Anne Murray, Melissa Manchester, Diana Ross and Olivia Newton John. Jordan also wrote Elton John's hit Rhythm of My Heart.

Singing her own songs that have become hits for other singers is much like wearing someone else's evening gown, she said. It looks beautiful, but different, on each woman.

Sculpting nature's beauty an inspiration

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Canadian sculptor and teacher Ruth Devor, who has exhibited at numerous group and one-woman shows throughout North America, recently opened her own gallery, The Sculpture House Gallery and Studio in Thornhill.

Devor's sensuous stone and bronze miniatures and large-scale sculptures are displayed in the attractive setting, where she also holds sculpting classes.

"My love affair with sculpting began over 35 years ago and has spanned several continents," she said.

"I've gained a tremendous sense of fulfillment and self-expression through carving and sharing my passion for this exciting medium with students."

Devor said sculpting nature's raw beauty continues to be both an inspiration and a very spiritual and humbling experience.

"I've carved in magnificent exotic stone from around the world, each unique in their colouration, veining, deposits and density, and each is a challenge."

Born and raised in St. Catharines, Ont., she moved to Toronto in the early 1960s and began taking art classes at the Artists' Workshop and the Toronto School of Art. In 1980, she worked at the Art Institute in San Miguel, Mexico, and for two summers in Pietrasanta, Italy, where she worked on a commission.

Her works have been exhibited in many Canadian cities, as well as in Florida, New York and Pennsylvania. Many are also in private and corporate collections.

She has tried many different mediums, including drawing and working with clay and plaster.

"I love working three dimensionally. When I was introduced to stone, I fell in love with the medium."

Devor, who works with marble, alabaster, limestone and granite, has taught at libraries, schools and the Royal Ontario Museum.

She said the comments from students "encourage me to continue to introduce others to this wonderful art form."

Devor also enjoys speaking to groups and organizations, and demonstrating the carving process. "It fascinates people,"she said.

"I seem to have this great need to create beauty in spite of the fact that my journey through life has often been very difficult. I've come a long way from that shy, small town girl from St. Catharines and I am profoundly grateful for the talent the universe has bestowed upon me."

Devor's work ranges in price from $45 to $18,000. The hours of The Sculpture House Gallery, located at at 23 Thornheights Rd. in Thornhill, are Wednesday, 5-9 p.m., and Sunday, 2-6 p.m., or by appointment.

Mediator uses skills to build bridges between groups

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto-based mediator, psychologist and lawyer Barbara Landau says she uses her expertise in family law and conflict resolution "to build bridges of understanding" between Jews, Muslims and Palestinians.

Co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, a group formed in 1996 by an Iraqi Jew and a Pakistani Muslim and became more active after 9/11, Landau facilitates dialogue groups for Jews, Muslims and Palestinians in Toronto.

There are some 30 participants, Jews, and Muslims mainly from Pakistan, India and East Africa, in the association's groups in Toronto. There are few Arabs and no Palestinians in these groups, Landau says. She also helps co-facilitate a separate Jewish-Palestinian dialogue group, and she organizes interfaith holiday celebrations.

The goal of her efforts with the Jewish/Muslim dialogue groups in Canada, she says, is to engage more Jewish people who are interested in meeting with Muslims to try to build peaceful relations in Canada.

She recently received the John M. Haynes Distinguished Mediator Award in Orlando, Fla., "for her far-reaching academic, professional and humanistic contributions to the field of mediation," at the annual conference of the Association for Conflict Resolution (ACR), a non-profit organization representing more than 6,000 mediators, arbitrators, educators and other conflict resolution professionals.

In 1999, Landau participated in a Compassionate Listening trip as part of Mideast Citizen Diplomacy, a mixed-religion group of North Americans that included two Palestinian-Americans. The Americans and Canadians travelled to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza.

Landau was accompanied by her husband Sy and their daughter, Niki. Both are professional mediators, trainers and authors. Their son Daryl is also a mediator, trainer and author. "We are known as the famous Landau clan of mediators," Barbara says jokingly.

Referring to the trip, she spoke of Gene Knudson Hoffman – "our spiritual leader – and we adopted her belief that 'an enemy is one whose story we have not heard.'"

The task of the Compassionate Listening group, she says, "was to listen to the underlying humanity in the stories, to listen as if what the person said might be right, that is without judgment or contradiction."

This process has a transformative effect on both the person being listened to and the listener, she adds.

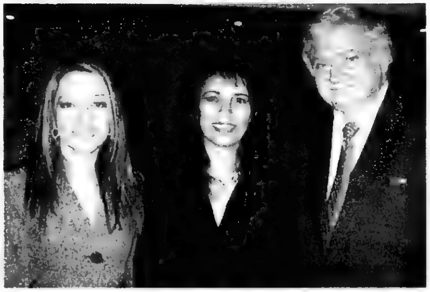
The biggest problem in the Middle East, she says, is that they are attempting to make peace from the top down. "I can't imagine that the process can be successful because you need to build trust between citizens for them to have the confidence to make peace."

She suggests "a multi-track approach" in which citizens engage with each other and with business and community organizations, coming together to meet each other to build relationships. "This puts a human face on the others."

Landau is a past president of the Ontario Association for Family Mediation and was the first Canadian member of the board of the Academy of Family Mediators (now ACR).

She received a PhD in psychology at the University of Michigan, an LLB degree at the faculty of law at the University of Toronto, and a LLM at the faculty of law at Osgood Hall Law School, York University. She practised family law until 1995.

For more information on Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, call 416-391-3110 or e-mail barb@coop-solutions.ca or shahidakhtar1@rogers.com.



PROTECTING CIVIL RIGHTS: Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, center, head of the Israel-based Shurat HaDin civil rights group, spoke about her organization recently to a group of more than 100 lawyers and professionals at the home of Rachelle and David Bronfman. She discussed her groups efforts to take the battle against Palestinian terror to court. Shurat HaDin provides legal representation and resources to protect the rights and interests of Jewish terror victims in Israeli, American and European courts. The event was hosted by Rachelle Bronfman, left, and Eddie Greenspan, right.

Beijing staggers the imagination

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BEIJING — China's sprawling capital Beijing, population 12 million, is one of those rare cities that stagger the imagination.

A metropolis of broad avenues and bustling traffic that is gearing up to host the 2008 summer Olympics, greater Beijing is monumental in scale, twice as big as Israel proper.

And the historic sights within its borders, from the Forbidden City and the Summer Palace to the Great Wall and the Temple of Heaven, are richly satisfying and memorable.

The Forbidden City, which the Chinese call the Palace Museum, is probably Beijing's number 1 attraction, a world cultural heritage site.

The imperial residence of two dynasties of emperors, the Mings and the Qings, the Forbidden City is so named because it was closed to the public for about 500 years until 1925. Even today, some of its buildings remain off-limits to visitors.

Spread over a garden-like setting of 72 hectares and surrounded by a moat, the Forbidden City is unique by virtue of its unchallenged status as China's biggest and best-preserved ensemble of medieval buildings and statuary.

The vast complex is divided into two parts: the outer court, which mainly served as an administrative centre where the emperor received officials and foreign dignitaries, and the inner court, the domain of the emperor, his family, his concubines and his retinue of servants.

From the Hall of Mental Cultivation to the Palace of Earthly Tranquility, the buildings are all painted in the traditional royal colours of red and yellow.

The brass statues of scowling dragons, purposeful tortoises and graceful cranes, which were used as giant incense burners, leave an impression of strength and power. A huge bronze vat, placed in front of the Hall of Great Harmony, still bears the scratch marks of an Anglo-French army that ransacked the grounds in the 19th century.

Yu Hua Yuan, the expansive imperial gardens, is filled with flower beds and rockeries and dotted with stately pines and cypresses.

Tiananmen Square, which can accommodate one million visitors, is adjacent to the Forbidden City. At one end is a gigantic portrait of Mao Zedong, who proclaimed the People's Republic of China in October 1949.

The square is ringed by a medley of grand buildings, from the Great Hall of the People to the Museum of the Chinese Revolution. Souvenir hawkers pester tourists and Chinese boys fly kites.

Tiananmen Square's most prominent structure is Mao's grandiose mausoleum, where the great man lies in state in a sarcophagus. I lined up for 20 minutes, along with hundreds of Chinese admirers, to catch a fleeting glimpse of Mao. His waxen features were unreal as he lay quietly in repose.

The Forbidden City, a world cultural heritage site. [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

As they waited patiently to enter the hushed mausoleum, Chinese men and women broke out of the line to buy bouquets of flowers in Mao's honour.

Inside, a sign warned: "Be quiet and do not talk."

After filing past the illuminated corpse, its cheeks dimpled and its dyed black hair neatly combed, I was funnelled into a gift shop carrying an array of cheap Mao memorabilia and trinkets. What would Mao think?

The Summer Palace, in one of Beijing's northwestern suburbs, strikes a completely different note. Set on tranquil Kunming Lake, the palace is a magnificent outdoor museum of classical Chinese architecture and gardens.

From the Hall of Benevolence to the Hall of Jade Ripples, the buildings bespeak grandeur and elegance. Perhaps the most impressive sight is The Long Corridor. More than 700 metres in length, it is decorated with some 8,000 lively paintings inspired by Chinese folktales, novels and landscapes.

But the palace, originally built in 1750, is also a powerful reminder of the domination China once endured at the hands of foreign powers. Razed by marauding French and British soldiers in 1860, it was rebuilt six years later, only to be ravaged again in 1900 and renovated after the 1949 revolution.

The Temple of Heaven, enclosed in a park in Beijing's Chongwen district, is almost 600 years old.

Its most outstanding building, the Hall of Prayer for Good Harvests, certainly stands out. Covered with glazed blue, yellow and green tiles, symbolizing heaven, earth and morality, it is 38 metres high and 24 metres in diameter and is supported by immense pillars.

Dragon scowls in the Forbidden City.

The Ming Tombs, found at the foot of Mount Tianshoushan, contain the remains of 13 emperors and such burial objects as precious stones, silver dishes and gold buttons. Only three of the tombs, the oldest of which dates back to 1409, are accessible.

The interminable Sacred Way, which leads to the tombs, is ethereal. The path is flanked on both sides by mature weeping willow trees and by a stately procession of Ming officials, warriors and beasts – horses, camels and dragons – hewn from marble stone.

The Great Wall, a bulwark against invading armies that was constructed over the course of 2,000 years starting in 221 B.C., and the only man-made object visible from space, traverses 6,350 kilometres across northern China.

The most intact section, in Badaling, was restored in 1957. On bright days, from its parapets and ramparts, there are scenic views of thickly forested mountains. But when I was there in early November, the weather was miserably cold and foggy, and the steps were treacherously slippery.

The full blast of winter greeted me when I toured one of Beijing's famous hutongs, the congested back alleys synonymous with the city's past.

Bundled up against the chill in the seat of a pedicab, my guide and I were driven to Liulichang Street, a veritable mecca of Chinese antiques, paintings, arts and crafts, calligraphy, curios, second-hand books and stationery.

Wangfujing, one of Beijing's busiest shopping streets, is the polar opposite of Liulichang, a cluster of brightly-lit name-brand stores, dazzling malls and, off on the side streets, smoky kebob joints redolent of China's far western Muslim provinces.

Playboy model leads team to women's football championship game

By MARVIN GLASSMAN

Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Anita Marks may want to be known for her accomplishments on the field rather than her undeniably striking good looks.

But last year, the 32-year-old Jewish quarterback took matters into her own hands by catering to some age-old male chauvinism. Marks posed nude in Playboy magazine as a way of generating more attention for her sport and for herself.

Not surprisingly, she received lots of attention this year – but not just for her photos. This season, her passing, running and scrambling helped her Florida Stingrays reach the Women's Professional Football League championship game with a 9-3 record. Along the way to the title game, the Stingrays routinely mauled opponents by scores of 87-0 and 84-6.

Mark's passing arm connected for many touchdown passes of 50 yards or more. Her ability also to run the ball coupled with a tight defence led the Stingrays to their outstanding record.

"This season was even more satisfying than last year when I played for the Miami Fury. This is a national league of the best women players in the country. We lost a few times and knew that to win, we all had to play our best," said Marks.

Anita Marks

In the championship game, played in Kenosha, Wis., the Stingrays were on the receiving end of a 53-12 whipping by the hometown Northern Ice in a game plagued by fumbles, interceptions and -6 Celsius temperature at game time.

"None of us played well, but I have to congratulate the Northern Ice for their great victory. Like everything else, I view this as a learning experience and we can only get better next season," said Marks.

Marks is savvy and does not fit the stereotype of the coddled athlete who has to be guided throughout her career. When not playing football, she works in Miami as a radio sports talk show host, though she aspires to be a television commentator covering NFL football.

Her idea may not be far fetched. "Anita's understanding of football is better than most men," said Liz Bartolo, owner of the Florida Stingrays. "She understands all the sophisticated run and pass plays, the Xs and Os that have made a difference to our team."

Marks is aided by great team work from her teammates, which include two other Jewish players. One is 27-year-old Allison Katz from Detroit, a huge football fan all her life who spent much of her adult life serving in the Navy.

"We don't think of Jewish women as serving in the Navy. Being in the navy matured me and in many ways, because you have to be physically fit to serve, it prepared me to play football," Katz said.

The other Jewish player, 23-year-old Melissa Green from Detroit, is a marine biologist. "I love to play and be fit, which is a must and challenge in football, but this is scary for my mother. I think she prefers I was in another sport, but I love playing football too much to do anything else," Green said.

The women football players have to be tough as nails to rebound from injuries. Over the past three years, Marks spent more time in the hospital than most women her age. In 2000, Marks suffered a major knee injury that sidelined her for the season. Two years ago, she had reconstructive surgery on both knees. Considering that her pay is way below CFL and NFL standards, at $500 (US) a game, another athlete might have retired under the same circumstances.

"I love what I do. If I can be an asset to my team, I will play. I am not a quitter," said Marks.

She has been rewarded with endorsements for many products, including one that also has Miami's other Jewish quarterback, Jay Fiedler of the NFL Miami Dolphins, as a spokesperson.

Born and raised in Miami, Anita's parents, Ned and Minnie Marks, were divorced when she was young.

"She took after her father, even though she lived with me. Ned was a star football player with the University of Miami Hurricanes in the late 1960s," said her mother.

Marks bears a strong resemblance to her father, who died of a heart attack in 1997. She played high school football and was the quarterback for the women's intramural flag football team at the University of South Florida in Tampa.

After graduating with a degree in broadcasting, Marks worked as a sports producer on television stations throughout Florida, but was eager to play football again.

"I love the game. This is not a tomboy thing. My mother was concerned in high school that I wouldn't have a date if I continued to play, so for a few years, I listened to her."

"Now I am an adult, and I feel the same way about the game now as I did years ago. People will accept me the way I am. If they don't, that is not my problem," she said.

Chanukah reminds me of miracles. We know the story of the Maccabees: there was only enough oil to burn for one day and miraculously it lasted for eight days. Jewish homes around the world celebrate Chanukah by lighting a chanukiyah and to commemorate the "miracle of lights."

In Jewish tradition, light symbolizes Torah, and the candles we light reflect a miracle greater than the burning oil: the survival of the Jewish faith for 3,000 years. As Jews, we have struggled to maintain integrity and observance and resist assimilation in a dominant non-Jewish culture.

As I prepare my own chanukiyah and rush around shopping for presents for my family and friends, I wonder how many of us stop to think about miracles. They are around us every day and we can see them through the positive changes in our own lives, though sometimes we have to look harder. As 30-somethings, my peers and I are constantly distracted by the grind of daily life: demanding jobs, relationships, children, financial concerns and so on. We have hectic schedules that don't allow us time to stop and watch the natural miracle of the sunrise or the leaves falling from the trees.

I try to see the miracles in my life. This past month, one of my best friends married her soulmate after dating and searching for years. Another friend who was having problems becoming pregnant gave birth to a beautiful healthy baby girl. My parent's house was severely flooded and there was a lot of damage, but luckily no one was injured. This Chanukah, I am going to Israel for the first time, after trying to arrange a trip for years.

Miracles bring joy, faith, hope and spiritual growth to our everyday lives. As individuals, we generate new strength when necessary, defy logic and refuse to give up on personal struggles. It is this same strength and the refusal to surrender that have kept the light of the Torah and the lamp of the commandments from becoming extinguished.

This Chanukah, I am going to take the time to appreciate the extraordinary miracles in life. I would suggest you do the same. Chag Sameach!

Miracles are all around us, we must open our eyes to see them. — Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, the Lubavitcher Rebbe

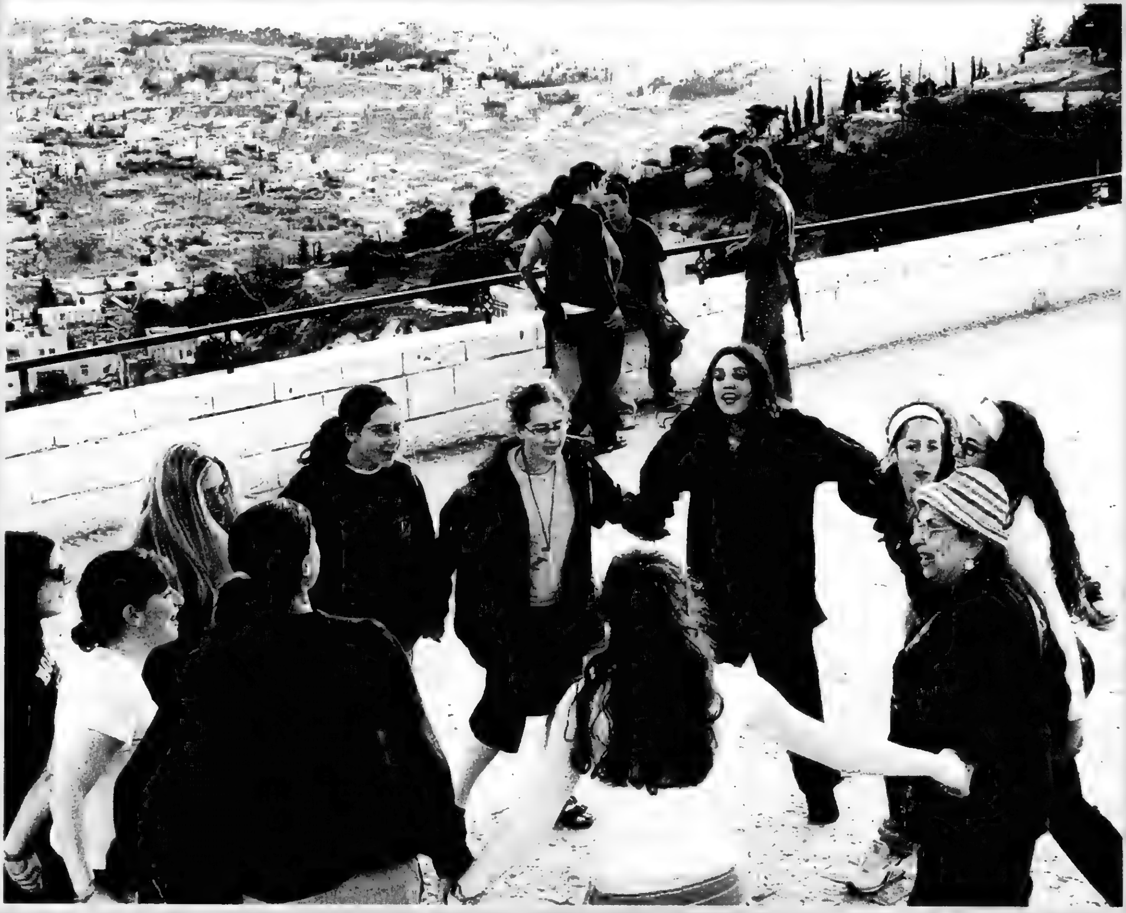
CHANUKAH GREETINGS 5764



[Jesse Gold photo]

They have reason to dance

EDITORIAL

The young women in the accompanying photo have every reason to dance. They are in Jerusalem, obviously happy, overlooking the Old City and its environs, experiencing first-hand the indescribable feeling and great excitement of simply being there. They were fellow travellers in this year's March of the Living, and now, likely to be friends for the rest of their lives.

The photo is fraught with significance.

It is a public statement of celebration in and on behalf of Jerusalem. In a year when such public celebrations were few, this one was like dew to parched earth. It was Yom Ha'atzmaut and time, once again, for Jews from the Diaspora to show the people of Jerusalem that the peoplehood that binds us is real.

In addition, the circle of dancers is trans-generational. The teenagers hold fast and lovingly to their chaperone-mentor, who is perhaps also a Holocaust survivor. The circle of hands connects one to the other, much like the forged iron links of a chain.

As well, as we can see in the background of the photo, there is still the need, alas, for the ubiquitous presence of security. Israelis and Jews are targets.

But still the girls are dancing.

And so should we as a result.

Chanukah, whose first candle we light tomorrow night, is an appropriate occasion to remind us that we should all be "dancing." For, despite everything that has happened these past three years, and continues to happen, we do indeed have a great deal to celebrate.

We need hardly remind our readers that Chanukah is the holiday of the underdog, of the courageous few against the vastly outnumbering forces of the many. Jews have always been outnumbered, but we have never stopped dancing.

That is part of the miracle of Jewish history, a miracle, of course, that we acknowledge in the special prayers and blessings of Chanukah.

We hope our readers enjoy the eclectic selection of features that we have assembled this year. We urge you to read them all in between dances.

Chag Urim Samayach.

Beyond Mrs. Maccabeus

By RAHEL MUSLEAH

Each Chanukah we glorify brave Judah Maccabeus
Who had the courage to defy Antiochus, and free us,
Yet it is not fair that we should forget
Mrs. Maccabeus, whom we owe a debt.
She mixed it, and fixed it
She poured it into a bowl
You may not guess, but it was the latkes
That gave brave Judah a soul.

One of my daughter's favourite Chanukah songs, a parody to the tune of O Chanukah!, extols Mrs. Maccabeus as the culinary power behind her sons' victory. The ingenious woman, according to the lyricist, Ben Aronin, wrote portions of the Torah into the latkes, fried them until they shimmered/they simmered; they absorbed the olive oil/and "made the Syrians recoil."

Despite its obvious fiction, Mrs. Maccabeus might be the only woman most children – and adults – connect with the Chanukah story. And whatever combination of activism and spirituality she infused into the comfort food she allegedly invented, few of us really take her seriously.

Our feminist connections are solid on Purim, whether you name Esther or Vashti as heroine of choice. Passover conjures up a bevy of role models: Miriam; Shifrah and Puah, the midwives who saved the Israelite boys; Yocheved, mother of Moses, Aaron and Miriam; and Pharoah's daughter. Rosh Hashanah retells the story of Sarah and Hagar, and of Rachel weeping for her exiled children. On Sukkot, we invite our foremothers alongside our forefathers as ushpizin (guests) in the sukkah. But Chanukah is the holiday of maleness: of warriors, battlefields and military might, of the High Priest Mattathias and his five sons, most notably Judah. Could it be that Chanukah doesn't have women to emulate?

So it was that as I played around on the Internet one day, I came across an intriguing Chanukah custom. Among the Jews of Tunisia, Rosh Chodesh Tevet, which falls on the sixth and/or seventh night of Chanukah (depending on whether Rosh Chodesh is one or two days), is celebrated as Chag Habanot, the Festival of the Daughters (called Rosh Hodesh el Bnete in Judeo-Arabic).

According to Rabbi Herbert Dobrinsky, author of A Treasury of Sephardic Laws and Customs, mothers bake honey cakes and give gifts (often jewelry) to their daughters, men give gifts to their fiancées, and all participate in a festive meal, a seudah, l'zecher ma'aseh ha-gevurah shel Yehudit – in remembrance of Judith's acts of bravery.

Hmm, Judith. I am pretty well-versed in the lore of biblical women, but Judith only floated around the periphery of my radar, historically murky, shadowed in anachronism. When I turned to the Book of Judith in the Apocrypha (writings not chosen for the biblical canon, including the books of the Maccabees), I found a story rife with historical inaccuracies, filled with elements of other biblical tales.

Briefly, the plot is as follows: King Nebuchadnezzar of Assyria (in reality, he was the Babylonian ruler who destroyed the First Temple) orders his general, Holofernes, to conquer the land of Judea. Holofernes besieges the city of Bethulia and cuts off its water supply. Judith, a pious, wise, rich and beautiful widow, promises to save the city with the help of God.

Judith removes the sackcloth she has been wearing for the three years and four months since her husband died, prays to God, dons her finest attire and jewels, and goes to the enemy camp. She tells Holofernes that God has sent her to grant him victory. He invites her to a feast (shades of Esther), and she meets him at his tent on the night of Rosh Chodesh Tevet. She pretends to seduce him, plying him with wine and salty cheese – to make him drink even more – until he passes out. Then she lops off his head with his sword (shades of Yael and Sisera), gives it to her nameless maid – who carries it back to Bethulia in a food bag – and orders the townspeople to attack the Assyrians. Judith leads the victory procession to Jerusalem, sings a song of praise with tambourines (shades of Miriam and Deborah); never remarries, though courted by many; sets her maid free, and lives to the age of 105.

So what does this have to do with Chanukah? There is no mention of Antiochus or a single Maccabee. Lori Lefkovitz, academic director of Kolot: The Center for Jewish Women's and Gender Studies at the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Philadelphia, traces the link. In the talmudic tractate Shabbat, the discussion of the three mitzvot incumbent on women (lighting Shabbat candles, going to the mikvah and taking challah) diverges to ask whether women are also obligated to light Chanukah candles. Yes, says Rabbi Joshua ben Levi, "because they participated in the miracle of Chanukah."

"That's it. Period. It's an enigma," says Lefkovitz. Several competing explanations developed, she explains. One grafts the story of Judith onto the Maccabean victory. Another explanation focuses on the talmudic tale of the daughter of a priest who, before the Maccabean revolt, decried the custom of the Greek governors who had the "right of the first night" with all brides. On the day of her wedding, the woman stripped herself naked in public, scandalizing her father and brothers.

"You object to my appearing naked," she exclaimed, " but not to the governor's sleeping with me?"

One tradition names the woman as Hannah, daughter of Mattathias and explains that her actions shocked her family into avenging the humiliation, spurring the Hasmonean revolt.

Judith is a favourite of artists, from Caravaggio's horrific in-the-act portrayal to Botticelli's paragon of chastity and peace and Cristoforo Allori's femme fatale, beautiful yet heartless. In a recent exhibit at the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion Museum in Manhattan, "Biblical Women in Contemporary Art," Julie Dermansky crafts Judith out of welded steel, showing an X-ray of her arms and hands through a light box. How strong do you have to be to decapitate a general? Judith has a broken wrist.

Yet Judith has not stuck in Jewish consciousness, and it's no wonder. It's not just the story's fictionality and circuitous connection to Chanukah that has probably deterred us, but the violent action at its core.

"Not too many women see themselves cutting off someone's head. We don't read the story and say, 'Hey, I can do that!'" says Emily Taitz, author of The JPS Guide to Jewish Women. Nor, I imagine, do most men enjoy envisioning a fellow male's decapitation, enemy or not. Ouch.

The violence barely draws a ho-hum from most adolescents today, says Marga Hirsch, a Jewish educator in New Jersey. Hirsch adapted the concept of Chag Habanot into an oral history project in which kids interviewed female relatives to uncover examples of heroism in their own families.

"Compared to the video games in which they explode people regularly, chopping off someone's head is small dice. At most you might get an 'Ugh' from a 12-year-old girl, but mostly they say, 'Good move!'"

Sure enough, when I did ask my 15-year-old daughter, she was hardly perturbed by the gruesome details.

"Judith's story fits in with the larger constellation of stories that acknowledge women's heroism and sexual power, including Tamar, Yael, Esther, Delilah," Lefkovitz explains. "The bedroom is the battlefield where women win."

It's important to remember Judith's bravery, initiative, intelligence, loyalty, friendship and faith, but "to do so unselfconsciously is problematic," she warns. "The story takes sex out of the realm of pleasure to the realm of dangerous power. Judith's beauty, charm, allure, attractiveness and magnetism compete with reason. We should celebrate Judith's presence in our mythology, but expose what's right and what's insidious about the story."

"Women couldn't face military opponents in the same way a man could," says Rabbi Jill Hammer, senior associate at Ma'yan: The Jewish Women's Project in Manhattan. "Sexual power was the power they had, so that's what they used."

The message for boys as well as girls, says my sister Flora Yavelberg, mother of three sons and Judaic studies teacher at Solomon Schechter of Essex and Union, N.J., is that because women couldn't fight openly, they had to manipulate. For that deceit to be eradicated, men and women must have equal power. Judith won't displace Judah, she adds, so Chanukah will still have plenty of male heroes.

Tamara Cohen, consultant and former program director for Ma'yan, grapples with whether Judith, warrior and avenger, is a good role model for Jewish women raised to be "nice."

"Sometimes I can achieve a lot using my co-operative and friendly approach, but I know that I have shied away from direct conflict," Cohen writes in Ma'yan's publication, Journey. "I was raised to do good, but I was not raised to rid the world of evil. The two are deeply related, but they are not the same."

Especially in these days of violence, she says, Jewish women need to "figure out how to take increasingly bold action to defend our principles and further our vision of justice."

Whatever ambivalence Judith evokes, both Ma'yan and Kolot hope to restore and highlight Chanukah's feminist overtones.

Ma'yan's guide to an updated celebration suggests story, craft, song and candlelighting activities; reading, acting and discussing Judith; writing an ethical will; and sharing women's art and recipes.

Kolot commissioned Bonna Devora Haberman's Mistabra Institute for Jewish Textual Activism at Brandeis University Women's Studies Research Center to create a Chanukah performance piece. The institute, which brings texts to life through creative methods in order to challenge contemporary ethical concerns, focused on the tension between the militaristic and the spiritual (the miracle of the light) interpretations of Chanukah.

"In exile, stripped of power, the Jewish people was rendered 'female,'" Haberman says. "The Zionist rediscovery of Chanukah – conquering the land, reclaiming control over sacred space – rendered us 'male.' We want to articulate an understanding of Chanukah that retains our connection to the land alongside a spiritual identity."

Other women's customs that have sprung up around Chanukah are worth noting. As on Rosh Chodesh, women don't work while the candles are burning. ("When I talk about this custom, someone invariably says, 'No wonder the candles are so small!'" says Lefkovitz. Oil and wicks make the lights burn much longer.) Among Judeo-Spanish communities in years gone by, the Shabbat of Chanukah was known as Shabbat Halbasha, the Shabbat of clothing the poor. People brought clothes to the synagogue to be distributed on Rosh Chodesh Tevet, an unambiguous, genderless custom we can all adopt. Some communities serve dairy foods and cheese in commemoration of Judith's victory.

And what a phenomenal victory it was. The last verse of the Book of Judith reads as follows: "No one ever again spread terror among the Israelites during the lifetime of Judith, or for a long time after her death."

And they lived happily ever after. Amen. So dig into those latkes, sing of Judah and his mother, and remember Judith, too. We could surely use an end like that to terror today.

Hell week, and it's only getting worse: letters from IDF training

By AVI YUFEST
Special to The CJN

To my friends and family,

I apologize (oops, there's 20 pushups) for the mass e-mail, but time is of the essence on the weekends I have off, so unfortunately there is no time to personalize all the e-mails. I'm still alive after the first week of pre-basic training and still hanging in there (we already had one quitter) and things are going well. I'm sore in about 10 different places, and I have a slight limp for now, but so far, so good. I'll do my best to recount the past week.

A Canadian writes home

On Sunday, we went through the induction centre, where we were photographed, dental x-rayed, fingerprinted and given our dress uniforms that we wear off the base. Doctors double checked all the soldiers to make sure there were no mistakes in our initial examinations. Later that night, we were transported north to our base in the Galilee district of Israel. (If you are looking on a map, it's right beside the Sea of Galilee, sometimes called "the Kinneret.")

We did a little running around that night from 11 p.m. to midnight, just to get a little taste, and then were shown to our rooms. The following day we were woken up at 7 a.m. for breakfast, then we did more running. Tuesday we were given M-16's, Wednesdays we went to the firing range, and Friday we were allowed to go home for the weekend (so here I am).

The training itself is very difficult. We are constantly running and doing pushups. We must run at least 20 to 30 times a day, even if it's just for short bursts of 30 seconds or so. If you make a mistake, pushups. If you laugh at something, pushups. If you say something stupid, pushups. If you are late, pushups… you get the idea. I've done more pushups this week than I had done in my entire life up to now.

When we arrived at our base, we were given kit bags with our combat uniforms, our helmet, our vests, jerry cans, etc. My clothes were too small, so when our samal (sergeant) asked who needed to exchange uniforms, I said I did. When he gave me the bigger size, I thanked him – which led to 20 pushups. There is no "thank you," "please," "excuse me," or "sorry" in the Israeli army, so those words are no longer in my vocabulary. This may also explain why Israelis have a reputation for having less-than-perfect manners.

After the firing range, we had to clean our guns and present them to our mefaked (squad commander) for inspection. I missed cleaning out the sight – 20 pushups. Other guys who had residues in the firing mechanisms were given 50 pushups. I have an old M-16 that is probably from the Vietnam War-era. When the Arabs attacked Israel on Yom Kippur in 1973, the United States immediately sent over boat-loads of weapons. There wasn't any time for bureaucracy. My gun still has a "Property of the U.S. Government" engraving on the side of it.

We have already been taught how to totally dismantle an M-16, then clean it and put it back together. At the end of training, one of the tests will be to do this blindfolded and within five minutes. Not a difficult task – it will just require some pushups.

At the range, my gun was not calibrated, so all my shots were high and to the left, but they were all together. The commander said the shots were accurate and wanted me to calibrate the gun this weekend and shoot it again next week to see if I'm accurate again. They want the accurate shooters to becomes snipers. I'm not too interested in that, so I hope I'm not forced into it. Yesterday, we were interviewed by the company commander. He said he wants the foreign soldiers to go into the paratroopers branch of our brigade. I told him I would love to, so we'll see where I go when I get to my home base in three weeks.

My squad was very fortunate to get the coolest, most laid-back mefaked around. He pushes us, but only as much as he knows we can handle for now. We can make jokes sometimes and we can make mistakes – he knows we are rookies.

He told us about how his parents fled Ethiopia in 1984 and walked 200-plus kilometres to a neighbouring country before Israel brought them over in a mass exodus of Jews. He is in a specialized paratrooper brigade and the last thing in their training is a 90-kilometre march with all their gear. He told us that when he was doing his march, he felt the way his parents must have felt years before, and it made him understand the hardships they had to go through to give him a better life. He knows how it is to be in a place where you don't speak the language very well and where you are considered an outsider at first.

My brigade will have to do a 65-kilometre march at the end of our training next year, and I'm not looking forward to that. We did a three-kilometre march on Wednesday to the firing range, and I was beat. The gear is heavy as hell. The vest, helmet, full jerry cans, jacket, gun, clips, bullets, heavy boots – it all adds up. Some of the stronger guys have to carry a stretcher, a very heavy radio and a larger jerry can in case people need refills. It's pretty intense.

Avi Yufest

The food here is not as bad as I thought it would be. Sometimes it is just junk, but yesterday, for example, we had shnitzels with pasta – not bad. Yesterday, I was also assigned to kitchen duty for the latter half of the day, which is actually a blessing in disguise because you don't have to run and there isn't much work to do. And while you aren't working in the kitchen, you can sit in the kitchen courtyard and eat to your heart's content.

In the mornings, we generally are up at 5 a.m. for some running before breakfast. Orthodox people are permitted to pray right before breakfast while the rest of us clean our barracks. A lot of guys have started praying this week for the first time ever, just to get out of cleaning up. I'm still cleaning every day, though. I figure that if I have to stand in front of God one day and explain to him that the only reason I prayed was to get out of scrubbing a toilet, I can't imagine he'd be too impressed with me. If I do pray, if should be for a good reason.

Two nights ago, my squad had guard duty for the barracks. It was kind of pointless, because they didn't give us loaded magazines until yesterday. I got the worst time: right in the middle of the night at 3 a.m. Everyone had to guard for half an hour, and at the 20-minute mark, you had to go wake up the next person. The length of guarding will, of course, increase over time. You can't talk on the phone, sit or read while guarding, only drink (and nothing alcoholic), so it can get boring. I would walk up and down the halls and when I reached the entry way outside, I would throw my gun at my hip, bend my knees, and start spraying the courtyard with fake bullets like Rambo. (You gotta have some fun when you can, otherwise things can get pretty boring.)

On another note, there is this incredible and very stupid divide between the Russian soldiers and the western soldiers. They really don’t like each other and yesterday a fight almost broke out. As a Canadian of Russian descent, I get the best of both worlds: the Russians like me because I speak the language (and I’m getting much better at it, by the way – they all say I speak very well) even though I was born and raised in Canada, and the westerners like me because I’m one of them. There are tons of Russians. I know them better than the American, British and French soldiers do, and they are good guys. They are very helpful when I don’t understand something in Hebrew (which happens a lot), and they are generally very friendly. They respect the idea that someone came from Canada to defend Israel.

Trust me when I say that the French, the Russians, the Israelis, the South Americans, etc. all think Canada is paradise, and listening to some of the stories they have to tell me about where they come from, it really is a paradise. Many people, without even visiting Canada, pine to live there, just because they hear only good things about it. When they finally met a Canadian, it seems that all their pre-conceived ideas about Canada and its people held true. I’m glad I was able to live up to all that.

Anyway, I’m back home until Monday. I wish I had some pictures to send. I’m still working on it, but I will send some soon of me in uniform with my gun. I’m getting a cellphone this weekend, so if anybody is interested, I’ll be more than happy to give you the number. All incoming calls for me are free, so it makes more sense to have people call me than vice versa.

That about covers it for now. I’ll try to write next time I’m free, but it will be getting more difficult, because people are going to start losing their weekends when they make mistakes, so it’s possible I may be one of them.

Until next time,
Avi.

Two weeks later...

Hello to all.

Two weeks at the base and I’m back home relaxing and recovering. There certainly is much to recover from and much to tell, so I hope you all have a coffee handy because this one is going to be a marathon.

For the life of me, I can’t imagine how CNN, BBC, CBC, etc. can question the Israeli army’s morality. When guarding a base, there is a whole process you must go through before you can even shoot at an approaching suspect. I guarantee you will not find this in any other war zone. When a guard sees someone coming toward his position, he has to yell in Hebrew, “Stop.” If there is no response, he has to yell, “Stop, identify yourself.” If there is no response and the figure is still coming toward him, he must then yell in Arabic, “Wakef walla ana watuchka,” which means, “Stop, or I’ll shoot.” If there is still no response, he needs to radio the dispatcher so his superiors are aware of the situation. Then he has to cock his weapon so the person (or persons) hear that he is for real. If the figure continues to approach, the soldier must shoot into the air. If they still come toward him, once he sees them more clearly, he must shoot them in the leg. If they are on heroin, or have super strength, and a bullet in the leg doesn’t stop them and they continue to approach, only then does he have the right to shoot to kill. If a soldier does not follow these rules to the letter, he faces a court martial.

I have yet to hear any stories about other armies in the world who put their own soldiers in such danger just to ensure that innocent people are not killed during wartime. While I believe the formalities take too much time and expose soldiers to unnecessary risk by allowing a potential terrorist to come closer to them, I am very proud that the army instills this morality into all its soldiers. It’s a shame the major news outlets don’t mention this in their stories about Israel.

My first weekend on the base was not as bad as I thought it would be. Special food is made for Shabbat and people are generally in a better mood than during the rest of the week. The observant soldiers really lighten up the atmosphere because of the euphoric effect Shabbat has on them. Breakfast was optional on Saturday morning, so I took the time to catch up on my sleep.

The days leading up to the weekend were exhausting. On Thursday night/Friday morning, I drew 10 hours of guard duty: 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. at the bunker (really an ammunition depot), 12 a.m. to 2 a.m. at the western lookout and again there from 6 a.m. to 10 a.m. I was lucky enough to have a partner with me all three times, because doing it alone would have been brutal. We are allowed to sit for 10 minutes out of every hour, and without someone to talk to, it becomes very easy to fall asleep. As I mentioned in my last letter, we are not allowed to talk on the phone or read or listen to the radio or do anything else while on guard duty, just sit for 10 minutes an hour. I am not looking forward to the times I’ll be guarding alone.

To add to my exhaustion, on Wednesday we had a day out in the field camping and training. It was an incredible experience, but it did not give me much time to rest. On Wednesday morning, we hiked 2 kilometres to our campground and had begun to set up camp. Before I got going on the tent, I was selected to clean up the area where the food would be kept. For some reason, we were camping in a field where cattle graze, so there were mounds of cow dung everywhere. There I was, a kravee (combat soldier) in the Israeli army, scooping cow crap with a shovel – not a great start, to say the least. After an hour of that, I was finally allowed to set up my tent. My tent partner, who was also shoveling, was absolutely no help. I had to set the thing up by myself, and it was not my best work. To make matters worse, our tent had huge rips in it, so if it were to rain, we would be screwed. Of course, it rained. I was anticipating a cold night.

After the tents were set up, we did some field exercises, which were arguably the most painful things I've ever done. We started with field rescues of other soldiers, so the scenario was that one person was shot and the other guy had to carry him to safety. My partner weighed about the same as me (190 pounds) so I slung him on my shoulders and carried him on my back. I don't think it was the most comfortable of positions, because he was swearing in Russian using words I've never heard before. After I carried him, we switched. The weight wasn't tough, but my height proved to be difficult. He handled me well. I was impressed.

After that, we did crawling exercises, and this is where the pain began. We first had to crawl over rocks that were not bigger than an average fist, but there were hundreds of them, so when you drag your body over them, needless to say, it hurts. After doing that a few times for a few hundred feet, we were then made to crawl through thorn bushes. Some people couldn't do it because of the pain, but most did. My legs and arms were so scratched up that after that exercise, I felt numb from all the pain. A few nights ago I was getting undressed for bed, and I noticed my knees and legs have hundreds of scab marks from the thorns, and even as I write this, I can look down at my hands and see dozens of scabbed scratches.

> 'My legs and arms were so scratched up... I felt numb from all the pain'

When night fell, we did a simulation in which we snuck up on a mock terrorist position. Our company commander took our platoon down the hill about 300 feet and we had to crawl back through thorn bushes and lots of rocks to a glow stick at the top. If he saw you, he would send you back to the bottom to do it again. Tito from South America tried to make a run for it near the end and the commander tackled him into the thickest thorn bush in the field.

When I was crawling up the hill, I stopped to look down and realized that we were crawling through an area of cow dung. To make matters worse, the hill we were crawling up had also been used as the company toilet for the past several hours. Well, a soldier's gotta do what a soldier's gotta do, so we crawled through each other's urine and through the cow manure until we finally reached the top – sore, bleeding, bruised, and stinky.

When we were finally allowed to go to sleep, we were told we had to wear all our clothes and our boots. I didn't want to sleep in my bag with all my disgusting clothing and boots, but if I didn't, it would have been too cold. In the end, I compromised: I was in the bag but my boots were hanging out. Not that I was going to get a lot of sleep anyway, because our company commander woke us up two hours later for a simulation in which our camp was under attack. Everyone ran out of their tents and took positions around the camp. Then, we were on the ground once again, crawling through thorn bushes, rocks, cow defecate and human waste. More simulations followed of people being shot and us having to carry them to safety. All this while we were half asleep. The company commander and squad commanders were yelling and going crazy. It really felt as if we were under attack – only minus the bullets.

On Thursday, we went to the firing range again. My gun is still shooting high, but at least it shoots straight now. The commander was impressed that I got all my bullets into the target's head, even though I was aiming for its body. We did some more exercises, this time in camouflage, so we all had to take mud and cover all exposed skin. It was hilarious to watch the pretty boys cringe at the idea.

The food in the field is offensive, to say the least. Every meal is the same: bread, canned tuna, canned meat (called loof in Hebrew), a tomato and an apple. Breakfast, lunch and dinner, we ate loof. I can't eat that dog food, so I survived on tuna and bread for my time out there. I kept dreaming about the day I'll be sitting in a nice sushi bar eating tuna the way it was meant to be eaten.

On Tuesday, we toured a number of bases in the north: one tank base, one artillery base and one combat engineer base (combat engineer is a fancy title for people who like to blow stuff up). The tank base is situated at the Israeli, Syrian and Jordanian border and is the first line of defence against an attack. Literally 100 metres away is an Unwanted Nobodies (UN) base that is there to “monitor” the peace.

The combat engineers did a few demonstrations for us with explosives. They detonated a few bombs, the largest being 2 kilograms. That bomb was absolutely deafening even from our safe position a good 150 metres away. It really makes you think about those 30, 40- or even 50-kilogram bombs the terrorists use and the devastating effect they have. We were told a 50-kilogram bomb could lift a tank right off the ground.

On Wednesday evening was our graduation ceremony from pre-basic training, so all morning and afternoon we had to practice marching in formations for the big event. My group had only been there for 3 weeks, but other groups had been there for months learning Hebrew at the base. All their parents came out to see them graduate, so we had to impress. I must have stomped my feet at least 10,000 times in unison with the other soldiers and my soles were in pain that night.

Before bedtime, our commanders spoke to our squads privately in an attempt to break down the distance between recruits and leaders, as is customary in the Israeli army. They wished us all good luck, gave us advice, pointers and opinions. It was at this time we got to see the more human side of our slave drivers. They are all very nice people and I’m honoured to have known them and to have trained under them, even if it was only for 3 weeks. I learned so many combat skills and now I’ll spend the next 4 months honing them and learning even more.

That about covers my situation up to date. Until next time,
Avi

P.S. The army has confirmed which unit I’ll be serving in. I’m going to paratrooper school!

Sensing the anguish in Kafka's Prague

By BARUCH COHEN

"Had one to name the author who comes nearest to bearing the same kind of relations to our age as Dante, Shakespeare and Goethe bore to theirs, Kafka is the first one would think of." — W.H. Auden

"…he gave shape to the anguish of being human."— Kafka biographer Ernst Pavel

After spending a week this summer in Prague, Kafka's birthplace, I returned to my home in Montreal, where my books on the city and its Jews lay on the table, just where I had left them.

This past July 3 marked the 120th anniversary of Franz Kafka's birth. Kafka, the modest, shy, extraordinary writer who explored the deepest mysteries of life and the destiny of his people, is, in today's Prague, almost only a name on a café bistro sign. There is also a small store dedicated to him, called the Kafka Museum, which has a few pieces of Judaica and a few books about his writing. But nowhere in the city where Kafka lived and wrote is there a meaningful memorial to this greatest of 20th-century writers.

The son of Herman and Julie Kafka, Kafka was born on July 3, 1883. He died June 3, 1924, at age 41, and was buried in his native city. About 100 mourners attended the funeral. His closest friend, Max Brod, delivered the eulogy. It is well known that in his will, Kafka ordered Brod to destroy his manuscripts after his death. But after much thought, Brod decided to ignore the will and published all of Kafka's manuscripts in his care. In 1937, Brod wrote the first in-depth biography of his writer friend.

Kafka received his doctorate in jurisprudence in 1906, and worked first at a private insurance company. He never looked upon literature as a career, though writing was fundamental to his life. In his diaries of 1910-1913, he wrote: "At this moment, I have a great need to root out my anxiety by describing it completely, and as it comes from the depths of my being to transfer it to the depths of the paper."

We learn details about Kafka's life from his writings, such as the unique works of fantasy The Metamorphosis, The Great Wall of China, In the Penal Colony, The Trial and The Castle. In these and in his other works, we sense his feelings of estrangement, guilt, anxiety – feelings that are symptomatic of his era, our modern age and my own life as a Romanian Holocaust survivor. I sense that he was engaged in an unending quest, experiencing seething anxiety at the realization that neither his problems, nor the world's, could be solved.

Indeed, Kafka's writings offer no satisfactory answer to man's plight. His greatness lies not in his descriptions of quandaries and obstacles, but rather in his portrayals of situations in which the main characters – seemingly normal and innocuous – are never released, never freed from their burdens. His subjects draw on the loneliness he felt within his own family, the misunderstandings between him and his father, his isolation as a member of the Jewish community and his consequent moral and religious exile.

In his diaries, he wrote, "My principle was to walk, to dress, to wash, to read, above all to shut myself up in my room, in the way that caused me the least trouble, and demanded the least courage."

As a Holocaust survivor, I can relate to these words. Kafka gave shape to the anguish of being human. I, too, expected life to provide decency and trust between human beings, but the world offered something entirely different: struggle, conflict and war.

Although the word "Jew" does not appear in any of Kafka's books, he was very much a

Kafka's views on religion were controversial

Jewish writer. Unnamed threats, which end in judgment and executions, fill his riddling stories. We do not know the identities of the accusers and accused in his tales, but we do know that fewer than 20 years stood between Kafka's apocalyptic fantasies and the Nazi takeover of Europe.

The character "K" in The Trial can only be a Jew – he is a wanderer, hunted despite his innocence, consumed by anxiety, turning his intelligence and his emotions against himself with a painful, overheated imagination. Kafka was among the first modern writers who, out of the ashes of his own assimilation, sought to reconnect to his people.

Kafka's views on religion were controversial. It is no wonder that his works have provoked so many different reactions. Religiosity without any institutionalized religion is problematic, but Kafka shared his approach with other Jewish intellectuals of his generation, including Brod, Hugo Samuel Bergman, Gershom Scholem and Martin Buber. Scholem, who illuminated Kafka's work by applying kabbalistic interpretations to it, regarded Kafka as a distant inheritor of ancient mystic thought, and saw the influence of the Bible and the Zohar (Jewish mysticism's key text) on his work. I consider Kafka's writing a kind of profound, intimate prayer.

> I felt I'd meet Kafka whenever I turned around a corner

While I was in Prague, I felt a certain sadness. But there were times when I felt uplifted, strolling on the same narrow lanes where Kafka once walked. I could feel myself walking alongside him. At those moments, I had a kind of revelation about the place, and could understand how those streets, wrapped in so much Jewish mystery and magnificent architecture from the Middle Ages could give birth to Kafka's work. There is, I think, something medieval in the horror of Kafka's writings.

Walking along the narrow streets of the Old Town, I felt I'd meet Kafka whenever I turned around a corner. I remembered the words of literary critic George Steiner, who said, "Kafka's nightmare vision may well have derived from private hurt and neurosis. But that does not diminish its uncanny relevance… Kafka was in a literal sense a prophet. He saw, to the point of exact detail, the horror gathering."

I was under the illusion that I would be able to recognize particular locations, such as the castle, from Kafka's descriptions of them. In fact, the Prague Castle is a vast complex of buildings. Seeing the landmark today, packed with tourists, I found it hard to imagine Kafka's mysterious edifice, with gates and watchmen, locked with an infinite number of bolts.

In the Old Town Square, I visited one of his family's apartments, which is now a museum. As I visited places from his life, it seemed to me as if he would emerge from one of the buildings to join me on my stroll.

On Kafka's birthday, I paced up and down Maisel Street, sensing that Kafka was with me, the remnants of his depressing childhood reminding me of my own. It was my last day in Prague. It saddened me to leave and not take more of the city with me besides the street name, the gloomy store, the shabby exhibition on his anniversary, a few books, all in Czech, displayed on a hidden stand. The Franz Kafka Society was closed for vacation in July and August.

A few hours later, I turned back and visited, for the second time, the Alfred Kohn gallery, which has a permanent exhibit on Kafka's Prague. In his paintings, Kohn focused almost exclusively on motifs from Kafka's Prague ghetto, creating many variations of the most prominent images – the Old-New Synagogue, the Old Jewish Cemetery, Joseforska Street (now Siroka Street), Maiselová street, the cemetery, the tombstones around the grave of the Jewish town's mayor, Mordecai Maisel (1526-1601). His subjects often complement each other, forming a panorama of picturesque corners. Kohn died in Prague on April 3, 1953 at the age of 85.

There are few other memorials to Kafka in Prague. Regrettably, the so-called "Kafka Museum" does not offer the visitor more than a small number of pictures and books. It was a poor contrast to a superb exhibition I once attended on Kafka at the Leo Baeck Institute in New York in December 1969.

None of the exhibits I saw in Prague suggested the majesty of the city's history. One of the oldest cities in Europe, Prague

'In my memories now... Kafka the friend, the Jew and his life' was a bridge between the East and the West. Its Jews were not only merchants and middlemen but also bearers of culture. Jewish tradition expressed itself in a variety of forms – rabbinism, mysticism, rationalism, modernism – and Jewish creativity flourished there. The Old Jewish Cemetery, established in the 15th century, holds thousands of graves. On its gate is written "The House of Life." The gravestones remain crowded against one another, and among them is the resting place of the famous 16th-century sage, the Maharal of Prague, Rabbi Judah Loew. The New Jewish Cemetery, located outside the Old Town, is part of the recent, emerging history of Prague's Jewry, reflecting the threads of assimilation and the horrors of the Holocaust. It contains, among thousands of graves, Kafka's final resting place.

My stroll gave me a sense of the historic richness of Czech Jewish communities. Some of this richness is displayed in the Maisel museum, which houses textiles, portraits, silver and manuscripts representing eight hundred years of Bohemian and Moravian Jewish life. The museum was reconstructed in 1894 in a neo-Gothic style. It is said to have been built on the site of a house where Rabbi Loew – who fashioned the legendary man-monster, the Golem, from the mud of the Vltava River – once taught Kabbalah.

The large, rich archives of the Jewish Museum, the core of which is its collection on the Prague Jewish community, were re-constituted after the liquidation of 153 Czechoslovakian Jewish communities during the Nazi period.

I also visited Prague's synagogues, attending services at the Spanish Synagogue and the Old-New Synagogue. The Maisel Synagogue, a famous tourist site, was originally built by a rich businessman, Mordecai Maisel, and had been a private prayer house in the 1590s. It displays fine-wrought Torah shields, pitchers (ritual wash basins), spice boxes, candlesticks, menorahs and numerous other precious items of Judaica. It is a fine museum, worth seeing again and again.

My attention was focused on a handwritten manuscript, dated Oct. 30, 1944, by Frantisek Bass. It reads:

I am a Jew
I am a Jew, a Jew I shall remain
Even if I die of hunger
I will not give up my nation,
I will fight always for my nation, on my honor
I will never be ashamed of my nation, on my honor
I am proud of my nation,
A nation most worthy of honor
I shall always be oppressed
I shall always live again!

As I flew back to Montreal, I thought about the sad remnants of Prague from the Nazi period, and the suffering and the destruction of the "old-new" Jewish community's life. Not only Jewish lives, but much valuable reference material, were destroyed. Documents that could have aided future researchers were destroyed by Nazi barbarism.

In my memories now, I carry with me not only Kafka's Prague, but Kafka the friend, the Jew and his life. I carry with me the image of the Jewish town hall with the Hebrew letters on its clock. At home in Montreal, I shall go back to Kafka's books to read, again and again, his letters and diaries, which represent his will, his everlasting monument.

In Prague, I saw only a few of the many things I had wanted to see. Yet even that little bit was overwhelming.

Chanukah, Italian-style, in Jerusalem

By BATSHEVA POMERANTZ
Israel Press Service

The warm glow of the Chanukah candles commemorates the rededication of the Second Temple after it was defiled by the Greeks in the second century BCE.

Almost 2,000 years later, in 1952, the rededication of a beautiful Italian synagogue took place in Jerusalem. Located in the city's centre, the reconstructed shul is adjacent to the Museum of Italian Jewish Art, which has, among its Judaica, a fine collection of Chanukah lamps.

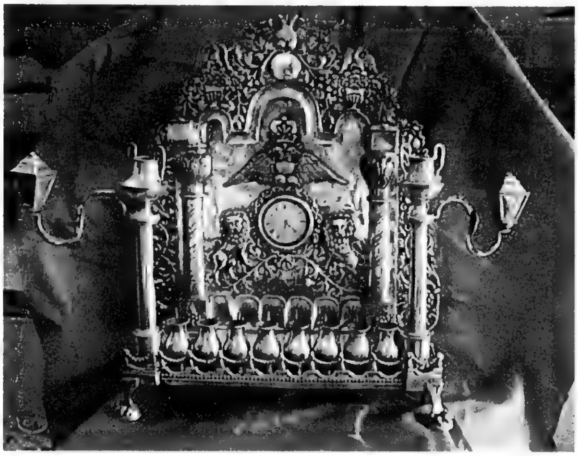
Polina Levy Eskenazi, the museum's educational director, explains that the Italian Jewish community is among the most ancient communities, dating back to the Second Temple, with similar customs to ancient Israel.

"Neither Ashkenazi or Sephardi, the Italian Jews have their own customs and prayers."

The Italian synagogue is used on the Sabbath, holidays and for family celebrations by Jerusalem's Italian community. Its items of furniture and the beautifully embroidered textiles for the Torah ark and scrolls transport visitors to another era.

During Chanukah, a large brass chanukiyah from the museum is placed in the synagogue for the kindling ceremony. The lamp, which has twisting branches and petal-shaped holders for the glass vials containing the oil, was donated by members of the small town of Casale Monferrato and resembles the original menorah from the temple.

The synagogue itself is from Conegliano Veneto, a village near Venice, and closed its doors after World War I when only seven Jews remained in the community.



A unique silver chanukiyah, which was owned by an Italian family but made in Poland, has small, removable urns for oil and a clock embedded in the center, probably as a reminder of when to light the chanukiyah.

In 1918, Rabbi Aaron Deutsch, a chaplain in the Austro-Hungarian army (which had captured Conegliano), was looking for a place to hold Yom Kippur services and heard about the synagogue. He obtained the keys, crossed the portals through dust and cobwebs, and stood amazed at the splendour of the place. Word spread and Jewish soldiers flocked to these services, making a fitting finale for the glorious synagogue.

About 30 years later, Italian Jews in Israel, wishing to continue their tradition and to rescue items of Judaica remaining after the Holocaust, negotiated with Italian authorities. As a result, the Conegliano synagogue was dismantled, packed up and sent to Jerusalem in 1951. At the dedication and first prayer service in 1952, an elderly Jew could hardly hold back his tears – it was Rabbi Dishon, formerly known as Rabbi Deutsch.

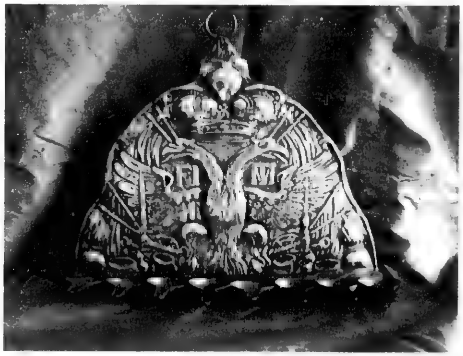
Italians brought 40 holy arks to Israel



An 18th century brass chanukiyah from the Museum of Italian Jewish Art in Jerusalem, currently on loan to Israeli President Moshe Katzav, was made from the helmet of a soldier serving in the Austro-Hungarian army.

Altogether, the Italian community in Israel was able to bring 40 holy arks, many artifacts and two synagogues from Italy. (The other synagogue is housed in the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.)

Chanukiyot, although similar in their general features, differ in style and materials used, and are influenced by the folk art, architecture and even the military history of the community.

A fascinating lamp from the museum, currently on loan to the official residence of Israeli President Moshe Katzav, is a brass lamp made from the helmet of a soldier who served in the Austro-Hungarian army. The pointed back is engraved with the symbol of the eagle and has the initials MT and FI for rulers Maria Theresa and Frederick I, dating the lamp to the 18th century.

Another original Italian chanukiyah is a 16th century brass lamp from Florence. Influenced by Renaissance architecture, it resembles a 14th century castle, with turrets and a high lookout tower.

One unique silver lamp, owned by an Italian family but made in Poland, has small, removable urns for oil and a clock embedded in the centre, probably as a reminder of when to light the chanukiyah. The lamp has two tall vessels, shaped like street lanterns, for the shamash, which were probably used during the year as Shabbat candlesticks.

The Museum of Italian Jewish Art can be found at on the Web at www.jija.org.

A young boy lights a brass chanukiyah with twisting branches and petal-shaped holders, which was donated by Jews from Casale Monferrato. The annual lighting of this chanukiyah in the Italian synagogue is a rare example of putting a museum piece to use.

From the Black Sea to the Holy Land

By JUDITH ARONSON SHAHAR

Little attention has been devoted to the subject of Jews who left Europe after World War II and were interned in British detention camps in Cyprus.

Their plight began in the summer of 1946, and for many, it was a difficult and harrowing experience.

After World War II, the Zionist organization in Romania was active, trying to recruit young Jews to immigrate to Palestine. Their efforts relied on emissaries from Israel (shlichim) who came specifically to inform us about our prospective homeland. At a meeting in northern Romania, Zionist delegates from different towns gathered. I was a representative, along with two others, from the Zionist training camp in the city of Ploesti, where I went in the spring of 1947 as a member of the socialist Zionist youth movement, Hashomer Hatzair.

My group lived on a farm where we worked during the day and then sang Zionist songs and danced the horah in the evening. The experience was meant to prepare us for kibbutz life in Palestine.

> Arriving in Cyprus, we were checked and sprayed with disinfectant by the British

At the end of December 1947, the Haganah undertook an intense operation to get 15,000 refugees from all over Romania to emigrate. We were supposed to embark in two large American ships: the Pan York and Pan Crescent, stationed in the Black Sea port of Constantsa.

Anna Pauker, a Jew herself, was a Romanian government official at the time. But she and other officials were not sympathetic to our cause. The government suddenly changed its mind: the emigrants would be allowed to leave as agreed, but the embarkation could not take place in Romania.

The Bulgarian government, which had always been friendly toward our aspirations, permitted the two American ships to dock in the port of Varna.

We travelled to the Black Sea in railroad cattle cars, lying on hard floors, trying to stay comfortable. When we finally reached the Black Sea, a number of Bulgarian Jewish youths joined us.

The embarkation took 2½ days to complete. The passengers came on board organized in groups of 50, each group with its leaders, doctors and nurses. We were each permitted to take only three changes of clothing. With a knapsack on my back and a small case containing my documents and photos, I started my journey to the Holy Land.

As the ships set sail from Burgaz, Bulgaria, to an uncertain future and perhaps dangers ahead, the 15,000 passengers burst into an emotional Hatikvah. The ships were very crowded, each of us pressing into shelf space where goods were supposed to be stored for shipment. Out of Bulgarian territorial waters, we soon arrived at the Dardanelles. From afar we could see the city of Istanbul sparkling with thousands of lights, an astounding sight.

The Jewish Agency, pressured by the British government and the tense situation in the Middle East, agreed to a British-proposed compromise that the two big ships should be diverted. Soon after the ships passed through the Dardanelles, the British naval presence of three destroyers and two battle cruisers escorted our ships to the Island of Cyprus. We, the refugees of the Pan Crescent and Pan York, became interned in British detention camps.

Arriving in Cyprus, we were checked and sprayed with disinfectant by the British, who took my documents and never returned them to me. I was left only with my photos.

The 15,000 passengers of the Pan Crescent and Pan York joined thousands of other refugees, most of them released not long before from Nazi concentration camps and now held as prisoners in Cyprus.

The camps were divided into two blocks: "summer camps" at Caraolos and "winter camps" at Dhekelia and Xylotimbu. I was interned in "winter camps" #65 and #67. Each month, the British allowed 1,500 Jews to enter Palestine, 750 from camps in Europe and 750 from the Cyprus camps.

Our struggle has not ceased

The camps in Cyprus were depressing: prisons with ugly huts and tents, surrounded by barbed wire and watchtowers. Nothing green grew there. Only sand could be seen. The camps were situated along the shore, but nobody could go swimming. From time to time, a number of young men escaped at night, through a tunnel that was dug under a hut with the exit outside the camps. They were picked up by the Greek Cypriot underground and the Haganah, and they were brought safely to the coast of Israel in small boats.

On May 14, 1948, we heard an announcement on the radio: our homeland was declared an independent state. With tears in our eyes, we danced till late at night. We were a free nation. But emigration from the camps continued to be restricted.

During the time I spent in the camp, a teacher from Lithuania showed me how to extract threads from a mattress and knit a beautiful tablecloth using needles made out of wire. I started a tablecloth with six stitches and finished it with 1,500 stitches. I donated that beautiful tablecloth to the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre – my only souvenir from the camps – and it is on display in the museum.

My turn finally came to take a course given by the Haganah. The British thought we were doing exercises. But a few days after starting my training I contracted malaria. British soldiers drove me to Famagusta Hospital. A huge gate creaked behind me and I was out of the camp. I looked through the Jeep's windows to see the fields, the sea, free people… and the desire for freedom grew in my heart.

After a few days at Famagusta Hospital, I was transferred to Nicosia Hospital for further treatment. A British Jewish doctor, a woman by the name of Gordon, treated me with quinine, and in a week I was well enough to return to the camps. In the hospital, I was emotionally stirred by the patients who suffered from depression: from Nazi concentration camps to the Cyprus camps was too much for many to deal with.

I was weak after my bout with malaria, and the British allowed me to leave the camps. On Oct. 27, 1948, I embarked on the ship Hatikva, and in a few hours, I arrived in the port of Haifa. A feeling of happiness overwhelmed me. I was like a bird set free. I thrilled to touch the holy earth. The land of our forefathers spread out before me. It was a miracle to finally arrive at my cherished destination.

The last group from the Cyprus camps disembarked in Israel in February 1949. Thirty-nine illegal immigrant ships, more than 52,000 refugees, were interned in the Cyprus camps from August 1946 to May 1948 when the State of Israel was proclaimed. The camps were forgotten, but in 1970, the bodies of 100 children who had died in the camps were brought to Haifa to be buried in the hills of Mount Carmel.

Our struggle today has not ceased. Jews from Israel and all over the world have to be united, fighting for freedom. Israel is our homeland forever. The holy earth is wed with the blood of our children. I pray for peace.

Farm gives teens in distress a bright future

By SHARON KARON
Israel Press Service

JERUSALEM — "I came here to get away from the police," said 16-year old N., taking time off from a math lesson to talk about his new life at Sde Bar, an agricultural community that gives youth in distress a new start.

Like many of the teenagers at Sde Bar, he had been a street kid, often eating garbage and stealing to get money for drugs after he ran away from violence at home. A year later, the youth with clear blue eyes and long blond hair is responsible for the two herb and tea hothouses in the fledgling community located in a stunning part of the Judean Desert, 20 minutes south of Jerusalem in the West Bank.

The farm's warm, nurturing atmosphere has had a miraculous effect, transforming kids with notable police records into productive, responsible adults whose lives have meaning and direction.

"There are no bad boys, there are only boys to whom bad things happen," says Yossi Sadeh, the founder of the community who is known as "Abba" (dad) to many of the 100 young people he has "adopted" since he first began his heroic rescue mission in 1994.

"In Sde Bar, home, warmth, love and understanding are key words. I try to serve as a beacon."

It all began one raw, cold winter day when Yossi, 33, who served in a secret, elite commando unit in the Israeli army, noticed three forlorn teenage boys hanging around a park in Jerusalem when he came home from the army for the weekend.

"There was a look of despair about them," says Yossi softly. "I offered them the use of my apartment during the week and said that on the weekend we could be together. They just had to keep things in order."

The homeless, hungry youths jumped at the offer and later brought in two other boys.

Realizing that he could give a home to other such youngsters, Yossi decided to move to a larger house. He found a place in Beit Shemesh and then in Kiryat Arba until the Israel government allocated land (more than 100 dunams) for the current farm in Gush Etzion.

There are only two rules at Sde Bar: no violence and no drugs. "This is the boys' home for life. It is not an institution," Yossi says.

Yossi's inspiration is Janusz Korczak

Some of the older boys act as "big brothers" and spend Shabbat and holidays at the farm even after they have been drafted into the army, have left for university or taken a job in the city.

"Conversation is the strongest tool," says Yossi, who uses every opportunity to reach out to the teens, many of whom are withdrawn and distrustful when they first arrive.

Meeting Yossi in the olive orchard in the heat of the day, I hear him respond quietly and firmly to a young man who complains: "I have blisters on my hands from pruning the olive trees. Get someone else to take my place."

"Why don't you go get a drink, then come back," Yossi says without raising his voice. "I'll be there soon. It's a chance to talk. I'll work and you can talk."

A young boy tends goats at Sde Bar.

"I try to understand each boy. I give them warmth and love. A smile is like a piece of candy for them," said the intuitive, self-taught educator.

"I don't get much sleep," admitted Yossi. "Boys frequently wake up at night with nightmares, and I help calm them." Healing emotional scars, including bedwetting, is a primary task.

Yossi's inspiration is Janusz Korczak (1878-1942), the legendary Polish educator whose passion for helping disadvantaged youth prompted him to set up homes for orphans. Korczak believed that children should structure their own world and become experts in matters that interested them. A doctor and an author, he wrote about the rights of the child. Although his fame could have saved him, he refused to abandon the children when the Nazis sent them to Treblinka, and he died with them.

Youngsters at work in one of the Sde Bar hothouses. [IPS photos courtesy of Sde Bar.]

Many of Korczak's progressive ideas have been applied at Sde Bar.

"When a boy first comes to the farm, we try to find what his interests and innate abilities are," Yossi says.

One 14-year-old boy is in charge of the sheep and goats. He takes care of their medical needs and even helps in birthing.

Other youths make goat cheese, including tasty herbed cheese and very fine olive oil. Youngsters are also in charge of the sleek horses and have won medals in competitions, while others built the attractive dining room, complete with an earthen oven.

To improve the quality of the hothouse crops, N. took a six-month course at Hebrew University's faculty of agriculture in Rehovot. A bright boy, he has thrived under the one-to-one flexible system of learning at Sde Bar.

"Sometimes, I learn math for half an hour, and sometimes for two hours," he says.

Six teachers tutor the boys, many of whom come to Sde Bar lacking basic reading and math skills. With personal tutoring and motivation, they move ahead fast.

"I have a good mind and I like to learn, especially literature," says N., his candid sense of self-worth reflecting a 360-degree change since he arrived at the farm. He has already taken several exams toward his high school matriculation.

Many of the young men go on to university, and six of the Sde Bar family have become officers in the Israeli army. Some of the boys have married.

Whatever emotional or practical problems they have, "Abba" Yossi is there for them – to discuss romance, career, or to help negotiate reduced rent for an apartment.

A $1 million-a-year operation that includes four apartments in Jerusalem, Sde Bar is under pressure, funds permitting, to take in 200 more teenagers.

With a success rate of more than 90 per cent, compared to a 60 per cent rate for other programs, the farm has become a model for other initiatives by the Ministry of Education and Department of Welfare, and it has received approval to establish a new farm in the Galilee.

The quiet, lovely tranquility of a peaceful sunset on the Kineret (Page B20) is poignantly captured by Jesse Gold's camera. In contrast, on this page, we see a scene of stomach-churning tumult and aggravation at Ben-Gurion Airport during one of the many work-to-rule strikes by public union officials this past year.

Book Reviews

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Mordecai & Me by Joel Yanofsky (Red Deer Press)

Mordecai & Me
Joel Yanofsky

Richler & Yanofsky: "Writers should take up a place in our hearts and reside there, impertinent as squatters," writes Montreal journalist Joel Yanofsky in explaining the long-held obsession that prompted him to write Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of a Kind.

Like a nervy young Duddy Kravitz taking on a challenge that many might have considered beyond him, Yanofsky succeeds at capturing the personality of one of Canada's best-loved authors in this quirky and entirely unauthorized biographical quest. Portraying himself as a sort of Woody Allen-type of literary schlemazel, he takes readers on an extensive excursion through Richler's fabled stomping grounds in Montreal, speaking with many people who knew him and presenting a surprisingly lively and riveting portrait.

With infinite chutzpah, Yanofsky cannily weaves details of his own unrealized dreams of literary success with insightful descriptions of Richler's celebrated life and literary accomplishments. In this, he reminds us of Zelig, the nebbish chameleon-like character that Woody Allen once played who was always elbowing into the lives of the rich and famous – only in Zelig's case, it was accidental.

Fortunately, Yanofsky's comic impertinence is easily offset by his strong writerly outlook and an encyclopedic knowledge of Richler's oeuvre. He knows his subject tremendously well, and it shows. Beyond all of the clowning and kibbitzing lies one of the strongest biographical sketches yet to emerge of this improbable literary colossus.

One of Yanofsky's conclusions is that "Mordecai Richler was the most infuriating, the most engaging, and complicated character that Mordecai Richler never wrote about."

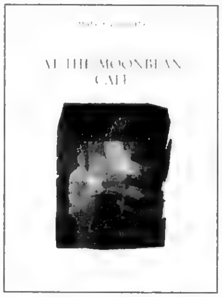
The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky by Karen X. Tulchinsky (Raincoast Books)

Tulchinsky & Lapinsky: Karen X. Tulchinsky lands a knock-out punch with her new novel The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, which conveys the powerful tale of fictional boxer Sonny Lapinsky and his family, set against the milieu of Jewish Toronto in the '30s, '40s and '50s.



This three-generational family story is filled with Toronto lore, from the look and feel of the old Kensington Market neighbourhood to the infamous Christie Pits riot of August 1933, an episode that plays a central role in the Lapinsky saga. Tulchinsky's sure-footed storytelling also encompasses Russian pogroms and diverse scenes of army life in Canada and Europe during the Second World War.

Thoroughly researched and well written, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky is a breakthrough novel for Tulchinsky that has already won much deserved praise. It's entirely understandable why Raincoast Books chose this heavyweight title (nearly 500 pages) to launch its new line of original hardcover fiction.

At the Moonbean Café by Malca Litovitz/ Borrowed Light by Merle Nudelman (Guernica Editions of Toronto)

Litovitz & Nudelman: And now for something completely different – two slim volumes of poetry by two Toronto poets. In her new collection At the Moonbean Café, Malca Litovitz describes what happens at the usual poetry reading: "We say our poems / then evaporate like the foam on cappuccino." Her book is for readers interested in a more prolonged encounter with her poetry.

Merle Nudelman's new volume is called Borrowed Light.

Toronto: No Mean City by Eric Arthur / Documenting a Province: The Archives of Ontario (University of Toronto Press)

Toronto & Ontario: The University of Toronto Press celebrates the heritage of our city and province with two recent lavish publications that will excite all those interested in local history.

When Eric Arthur's Toronto: No Mean City first appeared nearly 40 years ago, it instantly became a handbook for the city's nascent conservation movement. It has remained a classic ever since. Arthur, a New Zealand native who arrived here in 1923 to teach architecture at the University of Toronto, saw a sort of civic greatness in Toronto, reflected in its streets, history and buildings, and he taught others to see it, too.

Toronto: No Mean City is a visual compendium of this architectural greatness – much of which, dating from the 19th century, has given way before the wrecker's ball. The text reveals a deep knowledge of architecture, classical writers, and the history of Toronto as well as Rome, London and other cities.

The book has been republished in a third edition, with several additional essays by Christopher Hume and others, and a few recently-recovered early photographs added by editor Stephen Otto. It asks a central question: in the age of the megacity, can Toronto still live up to the greatness foreshadowed and promised by its early planners, architects and civic dreamers?

Published to mark the 100th anniversary of one of the province's most important heritage institutions, Documenting a Province: The Archives of Ontario at 100 provides a rich sampling of what that facility contains. The large hardcover book offers more than 300 intriguing illustrations of documentary art, maps, portraits, vital documents, photographs, letters and other artifacts, some dating back to the 18th century.

Some of the pictures are worth much more than the proverbial 1,000 words. Consider, for example, George Reid's deeply moving painting "Foreclosure of the Mortgage," in which a distraught family is gathered around the bed of the invalid father as a bailiff reads from a notice of dispossession. Or John Boyd's wonderful photograph of the 1890s, showing a train locomotive stuck in the snow.

Sample documents shown include the birth record for film legend Mary Pickford (born as Gladys Louise Smith in Toronto in 1892) as well as death records for victims of the 1918 Spanish influenza. A letter from WWI soldier Wally Gray to his parents describes his own serious wounds as well as the circumstances surrounding the death of his brother Charlie in a recent battle.

This commemorative volume, which contains a brief text in both English and French, celebrates but a few of the many heritage treasures stored in provincial vaults. This book is an excellent means by which to gain a better sense of what has been preserved for the benefit of all Ontarians.

One of the photos in Toronto: No Mean City is this 1895 building on Bond Street – the former Holy Blossom Temple and now a Greek Orthodox church.

GIFTS

Cinematic gifts for movie lovers

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

At the end of each year I usually draw up a list of my favourite videos.

This was a bumper year for Jewish videos, both in numbers and in quality and limiting my choice to a dozen was difficult.

I have listed them in alphabetical order and if you wish to purchase any of these titles – they make great Chanukah gifts – it is best to check with your local video store first. If they don't have it or cannot get it, all of these titles are usually available through www.amazon.ca or www.amazon.com:

AMEN

Opening film at the 2003 Toronto Jewish Film Festival is now available on video, but people wanting to purchase it will probably have to do so via the internet. Amen tells how religious leaders in Germany and in the Vatican ignored the plight of European Jewry during World War II and how one SS officer tried to appeal to the Church's conscience.

THE BELIEVER

Ryan Gosling gives a stellar performance in The Believer.

Powerful drama about a bright Jewish boy who joins a neo-Nazi organization and becomes one of the chief Jew bashers in the group. A 2002 Toronto Jewish Film Festival presentation.

THE BURIAL SOCIETY

Canadian film about a bank employee who steals a large sum of money from a local bank and tries to disappear by volunteering to work in a small town's Jewish Burial Society.

TREMBLING BEFORE G-D

Excellent and thought provoking documentary about the plight of observant Jews who are gay and their desire to remain part of the Jewish community.

INVINCIBLE

Tells the story of a gentle Jewish strongman who winds up performing feats of strength in a 1930s Berlin night club and who tries to alert the Jews to the dangers facing them should the Nazis gain control of Europe.

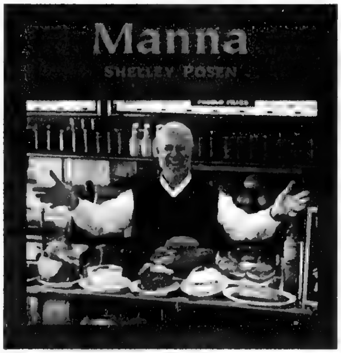
Musical listening ideas for the Holiday

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT



Holidays come with music. And music makes for happier holidays.

The following CDs recently arrived at The CJN offices.

In whichever mysterious way music reaches and stirs our soul, there is, among this very eclectic offering, something of special pleasure for every taste and every soul.

* * *

For the folk singers and fans of the Mariposa Festival among us, Manna by Shelley Posen (Well Done Music) is rich and rewarding. As the publicist describes, Manna is "a tsimmis of original songs, funny and serious, about Jewish food, family and festivals. You'll laugh, you'll cry, you'll run to the fridge."

It's true.

The disc is a toe-tapping, humming, shoulder-swaying excursion through the Ashkenazi folkways of the Jewish home and hearth. Food, festival and life's inescapable frailties are the songs' dominant themes. The music itself is a hybrid of klezmer, folk, vaudeville, honky-tonk and piano bar.

Posen's voice is comfortable and comforting, like that of a friendly neighbour who can cast benign spells by telling us stories. His lyrics are playful, poignant, witty and insightful. They also demonstrate a strong grasp of religious traditions and ethnic terminology. Posen seamlessly blends Hebrew, Yiddish and English throughout his songs, all of which are his own compositions and celebrate the warmth of Jewish family life in all its inter-generational love and drama.

One of the songs in particular, And We Sang Ha Lackhma Anya, exemplifies the album's success. It penetrates the heart.

In it, Posen describes three generations of Pesach seders with a melancholy yet ultimately affirming eloquence. The song's closing stanza, in effect, describes the entire album:

And the voices of the present/ Join the voices of the past/ And they all will sing together/ Just as long as seders last.

The CD is a treat for youngsters and oldsters alike.

sons and builders
SHIRAYIM

For fans of hard-hitting rock and roll, Sons and Builders by Shirayim is the perfect musical entertainment.

The CD has nine tracks, all of them rippling with heavy electric bass, long- steel guitar riffs and fast-paced pounding rhythms. High-level energy permeates the album. It is a remarkable fusion of hard-edged rock and roll and traditional Jewish liturgy.

Prayers that the five-member band has put to their music, such as Adon Olam and Mizmor L'todah, were never davened like this before. All but one track were written by the group.

Four of the tracks were recorded live at Clinton's Tavern in Toronto. The audience reaction adds a measure of immediacy to the music.

Sons and Builders isn't quiet listening, but it is exciting.

For the Yiddishists and devotees of Klezmer music, A Taste of Paradise by The Klezmer Conservatory Band (Rounder Records) is a sensory treat.

It begins with a raucous first cut of Romanian shtetl music mayhem, full of lively multi-instrument dance passages. From this first playful dance, it progresses through poignant poetry and unfettered frivolity, all songs telling the tale of the Jewish people's wandering in Europe.

The liberal inclusion of songs in Yiddish beautifully enhances the breadth and the weight of A Taste of Paradise.

The album also provides a historical and sociological context for the music. For example, A Fishele (A little fish), sung movingly by Judy Bressler, is an allegory for the strivings of the Jewish people.

The centrepiece of klezmer music has always been the weeping, laughing sounds of the instrumental trio: the clarinet, fiddle and coronet. In this album, however, the piano plays a large role as well. The addition rounds out the band's overall sound.

The 11-person ensemble has compiled a broadly pleasurable mix of tunes from Europe's vanished Jewish world.

The songs carry the listener to another continent and time when the language our forebears spoke was more than a means of communication: it was a code into each other's hearts and the chief vehicle for expressing their hopes. That language, of course, inspired its very own earthy culture and way of life.

A Taste of Paradise is a taste of that time and culture.

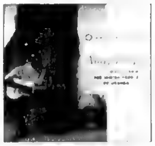
For enthusiasts of cultural fusions, Abayudaya: Music from the Jewish People of Uganda, is simply remarkable. Produced by Smithsonian Folkways Recordings, the album is a unique compilation of 24 pieces of liturgy, hymn and song that combines traditional African music with Hebrew liturgy.



Many North Americans are now more familiar with the sounds of African music as a result of the initiative taken by Paul Simon in 1986 when he incorporated the unique sounds of South Africa in his album Graceland.

Abayudaya's harmonies are rich and smooth, and the rhythms are fabulously fluid, sweeping the listener along in their velvet flow. The fact that there are so many children's voices on the album makes the music even more of a cross-cultural treat. The singer's heavy accents, at times, make the lyrics difficult to discern. But this is a minor matter and resolved as the ear becomes accustomed to the voices and pronunciations. Among the 24 songs are the familiar prayers Adon Olam, Lecha Dodi, Hinei Ma Tov, but sung in wholly unfamiliar ways to our western ears.

The liner notes provide background information about Uganda's Jews: "The Abayudaya, a community of approximately 600 people living in villages surrounding Mbale, in Eastern Uganda, are practising Jews. Many members scrupulously follow Jewish ritual, observe the laws of Sabbath, celebrate Jewish holidays, keep kosher and pray in Hebrew."

The album was recorded in a thatched hut on the grounds of the Mount Elgon Hotel, on the outskirts of Mbale.

Classical music lovers will be grateful for Lyra Hébraique: Music of Jewish Composers (CBC Records).

It brings together three very talented musicians – Suzanne Shulman (flute), Mark Childs (viola) and Erica Goodman (harp) – to perform compositions by world-renowned composers Ben Steinberg, Paul Ben-Haim, Milton Barnes, Lothar Klein, Ernest Bloch and Brian Cherney.

Lyra Hébraique

Steinberg is the musical director at Temple Sinai Synagogue in Toronto and his music is the first track on the CD, establishing the mood and imagery for more than an hour of calming, soothing listening.

The prominence of flute passages evokes pastoral images of biblical hills in ancient times, the shepherd herding his flock, a lyre at his side and his eyes fixed reverentially to a horizon where the vast blue sky meets the face of his God.

The compositions stir the imagination as they soothe the soul.

Shlock Rock: Almost on Broadway could really be called Broadway's favourite tunes meet Crown Heights' favourite prayers and musar (ethical instruction).

Shlock Rock
On Broadway

This collection of songs brings forthright messages of faith, prayer and practice to the familiar musical stylings of Broadway. The tunes are quickly recognizable from such famous productions as Mary Poppins, Grease, Fiddler on the Roof and My Fair Lady. The lyrics are generally witty and clever.

Lenny Solomon, the lead singer, has a pleasing, stay-at-home type of voice and is frequently joined by a supporting choir of diverse voices.

Buying Israeli toys

By E. B. SOLOMONT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Jacob Burgida is sure his five-month-old son loves his Symphony in Motion mobile.

When the baby gazes up at the mobile, he quiets down and coos, says Burgida, describing what he sees as his son's approval of the Israeli-made toy.

While the Burgida infant may be comforted by the mobile's shapes and colours, his father says he is pleased to have purchased the toy from LittleIsrael.com, a Web site that sells Israeli toys and clothing to children in the United States.

"I am a strong supporter of Israel and especially at this time, we need to use any avenue we can to continue our support," Burgida says.

> Web sites cater to North American Jewry

As Israel's economy continues to founder with a weak technology sector and the violence of the Palestinian intifadah, buying Israeli products has become a popular way for Diaspora Jews to support the Jewish state.

Tourists in Israel often make an effort to go on spending sprees when in the Jewish state, and bazaars and fairs in the United States where Israeli merchants sell their goods have become popular.

But many consumers don't live near those fairs or find it more convenient to do their shopping from home. So an increasing number of Jewish consumers are turning to the Internet to support Israel through their purchasing power.

Web sites like LittleIsrael.com, Shopinisrael.com and Israeliwishes.com cater to the North American Jewish consumers' desire to help Israel's economy.

"It's an easier way to directly affect the economy rather than donating money or travelling there," says Adam Horowitz, who was happy to learn that the pajamas he bought for his nephews had become a favourite with the boys and their mother, who approved of the quality.

For one of LittleIsrael.com's founders, Jonathan Koch, a trip to the shoe store convinced him that Israel's high-quality goods could be marketed in North America.

Koch was trying to decide between two pairs of shoes when he happened to notice that one pair was made in Israel. That sealed the deal for him.

Thinking others would choose to buy Israeli products if given an opportunity, the self-described "serial entrepreneur" decided to capitalize. LittleIsrael.com was born a few months later as the cooperative effort of Koch, Russ Pechman and Howard Felson.

The Web site was launched officially in October.

"Buying Israel shouldn't be a sacrifice," Koch says. "It's about buying products at a good price and supporting Israel at the same time."

Israeli officials appreciate the move, too. The Jewish state has always relied on foreign trade, given its small domestic market, says Zohar Peri, Israel's economic minister for North America. "Today that small market is even weaker. We will export and live; that's the motto Israelis know."

Although Peri says that more substantive economic help to Israel lies in business-to-business ventures, he says aid to small businesses is important, too.

Amid e-commerce ventures that sell Israeli artwork, beauty products and jewelry, LittleIsrael.com has found a niche in the children's clothing and toy market.

The site features more than 200 Israeli-made products geared to infants through six-year-olds, ranging from blocks to baseball-covered pajamas to a bath toy that lets children fish for foam sea creatures in the tub. The products on the site sell for anything from $10 to $300.

LittleIsrael.com's products are not necessarily Jewish in nature. They're simply an alternative to the average toy store that allows buyers to benefit Israel, the site's founders say.

In addition to promoting Israelis' wares online, LittleIsrael.com donates 10 per cent of its profits to several Israeli charities, including the Alyn Children's Hospital, the Israel Sport Center for the Disabled, the Jerusalem Post Toy Fund and OneFamily, the Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund.

While Pechman says the primary goal is to help the Israeli economy, he acknowledges the positive effect it could have on kids' impressions of the Jewish state.

Young children absorb negative associations from violence and problems they hear about Israel, Pechman says. "By getting a gift from Israel, it's almost creating a new positive association" for the child.

Since its launch, the LittleIsrael.com Web site has generated several thousand hits. The founders say the timing is right for businesses like LittleIsrael.com.

"Sept. 11 raised our awareness of terrorism and anti-Semitism," Koch says. "Coupled with the intifadah and constant news of terrorism, the timing of these events had a big role in our mind-set when thinking about this."

Burgida rates the site "top tier" and says the concept seemed to be the best indirect way to help Israel.

> 'Best indirect way to help Israel'

"You buy products you are looking for anyway and help because you really want to help," he says.

For some customers, shopping Israeli online is simply the most feasible way to show their support.

"I don't have the opportunity to get on a plane and visit right now, but as American Jews we have an obligation to support our homeland in any way we can," says Yonni Wattenmaker, who bought toys for her niece and nephew on LittleIsrael.com.

A visit to LittleIsrael.com lets consumers shop by age category and product type. For shoppers struggling for ideas, the site also promotes the most popular items – a multitoy crib addition, that cost $39.95 (US), was recently featured.

Koch envisions selling computer software and other product categories in the future.

For now, LittleIsrael.com focuses on buyers getting their products from the purchaser as quickly as possible.

LittleIsrael.com only sells Israeli products that have U.S. distribution centres, because waiting three weeks for a toy is not acceptable to today's consumer, the company says.

Many customers are pleasantly surprised to hear they will get their purchase within a few days, says Pechman, who recently attended an Israeli goods fair to promote LittleIsrael.com. But "people were like, as long as it gets here before Chanukah, that's enough."

THE GREY ZONE

Outstanding Holocaust drama about the dilemma faced by the 12th Sonderkommando unit in Auschwitz which was planning to launch a revolt against the Nazis. Directed and scripted by Tim Blake Nelson, this is an important addition to the genre of Holocaust films and was the closing film at the 2002 Toronto Jewish Film Festival.
